Mrs. McEwan Tells Of School-Day Romance; Pleased With Eugene

John James Jr., out of the room and cautioned them not to awaken Jeannette, three years old, sleeping in the adjoining room. She sat timidly to await the questions of the reporter awhile before she spoke again. Her long gold earrings with two large ivory drops reached nearly to her shoulders, yet, her brown satin dress with its large white lace bertha collar held firmly in front with a large jeweled brooch gave her a quaint, mid-Victorian appearance.

John J. McEwan and Violetta McEwan grew up together in the same town, Alexandria, Minn., and attended the same grammar school and high school. There was a romance of school days. In the "old golden rule days" they met, and later on, in high school, they fell in love and were "practically engaged" before either was graduated.

"The first time I noticed John, as I recall it, was on the last day of school in Alexandria, when I was in the sixth grade," said Mrs. McEwan. "The teacher of the seventh grade called him up in front of the room to receive a book as a reward for the highest scholarship for that grade, and then, while he was standing there, she called me to receive some sort of funny wooden spoon which they gave me, as an award for the highest scholarship record in my grade."

One unruly lock of Mrs. McEwan's extreme boyish bobbed hair fell from place and slowly worked its way over her forehead. She gave her head a little "swish" to send it back in place and, as she did so, the bigness of her blue eyes became more evident from beneath long brown lashes. Her hair is light brown, a shade too dark for blonde, her skin is tanned, and she has a natural girlish rosininess in her cheeks which suddenly becomes rosier when she mentions "John."

"But the real romance began in the Alexandria high school when we were in one of the plays," Mrs.

Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch, John was Mr. Bob, and I took the part of Mrs. Wigg. After rehearsal he asked to take me home.

"Since then it has been a romantic affair right along," Mrs. McEwan confesses.

While Captain McEwan was attending Pillsbury military school and later West Point, Mrs. McEwan, then Violetta Peterson, was a co-ed at Hamline University at St. Paul, where she belonged to the Athenaeon sorority. After graduating from Hamline in 1915 she taught dramatics in the high school at Valley City, N. D.

Mrs. McEwan's father is in the lumber business.

"I didn't know a thing about the army until I married into it," she said. "I adore West Point, it is one of the loveliest spots in the country, and of course, we have many friends there. Our son, Jimmy, wept bitter tears when he had to leave the cadets, who were so good to him. He was the mascot of the football team, you know."

"I know we won't regret getting out of the army though. Captain McEwan is more interested in coaching than anything else, and this is the time for him to give himself up to such a career, while he is young. Then too, in the army, they kept us jumping around like 'jack rabbits.' Every six months we had to store our things and move, which proved quite complicated with two children.

"I'm really not athletically inclined. I adore football, and always attend all the games. I love to get out and play golf, and tennis but I confess I play a poor game.

"I have always said if I ever went back to a University or college town I would go back to school. I like to study. I am rather interested in political economy and I love dramatics. Later on, when we either buy or build our own home and locate permanently, I am going to take a few courses at the University.

"Never before have I been farther west than Texas, and I am thrilled with the idea of being out here in Oregon. And to think we will be here for five years."
