Pension System Provides for Rise in Pay and Small Payments Into Insurance Fund

The Emerald is publishing the following graphic explanation whelming margin, Sphinx missed of the workings of the pension system for professors, which is now many cripples and performed in use at Oregon, to bring before the students and faculty the facts worse in general than in their last surrounding the retirement plan.

The worried look has gone from the face of the prof. It has been replaced, however, by a puzzled look.

The Oregon faculty members owe it to President Hall that they are no longer worried about the possibility of going to the poor-house when they are too old to teach. There is now, for the first time, a pension system which assures all those who are willing to join the plan and who will contribute part of the cost from their salaries, that they shall receive a modest annuity in their declining years.

But this is what is puzzling some of them: The talk was that this annuity was to amount to about half of the professor's present pay. Yet, when the professors received their policies this month from the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association, some were for about half pay, while others were for far, far less Just as President Hall removed the worried look, the purpose of this article is to remove the puzzled look.

Facts Cited

These are the facts, according to Professor Edgar E. DeCou, mathematician:

If a professor is under 45 years old, the policy he holds tells the whole story. His salary was increased 5 per cent to induce him to take out this policy, he has it, and he will pay in premiums for exactly what he will get in annuity. There is no more coming to him for the simple reason that he will need no more; he has got it all; he is still young enough to accumulate sufficient protection by the retiring age.

If the professor is over 45 years, however, his policy looks distressingly small to him. It is small.
