Stop Inter-Campus Vandalism

THE destruction of the concrete "O" on the slopes of Skinner's Butte Friday night has aroused a storm of indignation over what probably was the worst piece of vandalism ever perpetrated here. Student, university and city authorities are seeking clues as to the identity of the persons placing the dynamite charge, but as yet nothing definite has been found. Of course the tendency in Eugene is to place the blame on the students of our neighboring institution, Oregon State college, and a storm of vigorous denials should be due from Corvallis about today.

But Oregon students should not be too hasty in placing the blame. Always before, their invasions of the Oregon campus, though disturbing, have carried with them an element of humor. There has been nothing really vicious or destructive in smearing orange paint on the Pioneer or even in attempting to set fire to the bonfire a night or two ahead of time. The destruction of the "O" is much more serious, and one should not judge unless he has some facts to use as a basis.

Last January the famed Iron Woman of the Oregon State campus was totally destroyed with sledge hammers by some vandals whose identity has not yet been determined. There was no direct attempt from Corvallis to place the blame on the University of Oregon.

No matter who was responsible for the destruction of the "O" and of the Iron Woman, one fact is obvious. Both incidents are outgrowths of the violent and over-exaggerated rivalry which has existed between Oregon and Oregon State for nearly 50 years. It is time that such should stop. University authorities should take steps to punish and punish severely students who participate in painting expeditions to Corvallis, and the authorities of the College should punish those who come to Eugene. This would eventually result in an end to vandalism between the two institutions.

Suggestion for Golf Course

BACK at an eastern college, because space was limited and expensive, they have adopted a novel way for students to play golf. Instead of having nine holes they have but one. The whole energy of the student goes into the one task of learning how to drive. He does not have to walk miles over the course, he doesn't have to drag a heavy bag of sticks around, he doesn't have to waste time hunting for lost balls.

When he learns to drive correctly he then moves to the putting green. Any good golfer knows the value of a few hours on the green. And before the term is over the student may hope to be well enough along to be able to go on a public course without being too much ashamed of his game. Oregon might easily use such a course for its golf-minded students. Kincaid field might make a good close-in site.

Harvard university is facing difficulties with child welfare groups for throwing several small boys in a wire cage beneath the grandstand when they were nabbed trying to sneak into a football game. The youths probably found it difficult to find knot holes in the cement stadium.

Co-eds today are growing taller and thicker than they used to be several years ago, says an eastern scientist. Which is a nice way to get around saying they weigh more.

Fraternity men at U. C. L. A. held a group "sing" on the library steps the other day. At Oregon, the Order of the "O" holds a group "swing" for the benefit of the frosh.

The Collegiate Pulse

THE GROWTH OF TRADITIONS
Class spirit among the members of the sophomore class will grow in varying degrees during the month, the news columns of The Daily report.

As is the case in all such things, some members of the class will exhibit little or no class spirit, while others will have sparse collections of it. Women, it is practically certain, will show none.

According to the prognosticators, the younger members of the class will contribute but little to the festivities, while the older ones will add materially.

Oh, all right, we'll explain it all. The sophomore class is staging a beard growing contest. All those sophs having class spirit are urged to grow whiskers on their faces for a period of one month. The campus will lean back and endure the sight of scores of unshaven faces, innocent of tonsorial attention, while the second year men raise "class spirit."

Perhaps it should be called an endurance contest—University of Washington Daily.

Thacher Writing Short-story Text

Two proposals to write a book on short-story writing have been received by W. F. G. Thacher, professor of advertising and English. Mr. Thacher says he has planned for some time to write a book on the subject, but has thought that there were already too many books covering this field. He plans to accept one of these offers, and has already started the book.

Professor Thacher has been writing short stories and teaching courses in short-story writing for a number of years, he says, but this will be his first book on the subject. At present Mr. Thacher is teaching the course in short-story writing here, and is also writing stories, several having been published in magazines of national circulation.

BOOK CIRCULATION SHOWS INCREASE

An increase of 16 per cent in the number of books circulated from the University library for the month of October, 1929, over the same month in 1928, is shown by the October reports released recently by M. H. Douglass, head librarian.

In October, 1928, 58,717 books were put into circulation. During the month just ended, 67,845 books were released.

The Condon reserve made the greatest gain, jumping from 29,504 in October, 1928, to 37,297 last month. Business Administration library circulated 1967 more books last month than in October 1928.

A total of 1640 new books were placed on the shelves last month.
