Even Text-Book Distribution

A PPARENTLY the business depression has struck the University Co-op. Several interviews with campus personages have appeared in the Emerald, all pointing out the regrettable lack of real erudition among Oregon students as reflected in the comparatively small amount of money they hand across the Co-op counter for text-books.

Oregon students, the interviews declaim, prefer to save their money and rely on books in the library to put them through their courses. Students at Stanford and other large schools spend much more than we do for learned tomes. Is there, one interview-source asked suggestively, any correlation between the book-budget and scholarship?

We prefer to regard the situation as relatively of little importance. No amount of propaganda will shame students into buying more books than they feel they can afford. The relation between the number of books owned by a student and his attitude toward education is obscure, to say the least.

But there is room for a more equitable apportionment of the student's texts among the courses he takes. Reform here must come from the faculty. If certain courses, notably in languages and literature, did not require the purchase of so many books unattainable at the library, students would be better able to buy texts for their other courses.

Students taking the course in French literature have so far this year been asked to buy six books, three each term. A probable three more spring term will raise the year's quota to nine. At an average cost of $1.25 (a very reasonable appraisal), $11.25 is the book bill in this one course for the year. The use of an anthology of French literature or an extensive compilation would cut the cost to less than half and would at the same time allow the knowledge seeker to purchase books on history, economics or sociology which he might consider more desirable for his private library than a half-dozen volumes of sixteenth century French literature.

Hula Skirts in India and Oregon

HOW many people know that Ramsay MacDonald is a Republican senator? Or that Aimee Semple MacPherson's taking a Hawaiian hula-hula skirt to India is the most interesting news about India? Or that the proposed state police plan would place power in the hands of private power companies?

Those instances given above may seem inexcusable as answers in a current events examination given University students -but the mistakes are no more important than those made daily by thousands of newspaper readers. The examination given the University freshmen called for hurried answers; the questions given Oregon citizens are proposed months before they need be answered.

Elections are now some four months old-and many a voter may have thought more about hula-hula skirts than about the measures and men on his ballot. But because Oregon citizens have marked their ballots they have not escaped the problems. Today new ones are being proposed. The situation in Germany changed face yesterday. Last week the Indian problem was exceedingly important.

It is to be remembered, however, that these questions are now being only instituted, being only proposed. Our NEXT elections will call for Oregon voters to decide which men they want to meet TODAY'S problems. It is likely that many citizens will wonder why Ramsay MacDonald is not on the Republican list for senator.

No man nor woman can decide hurriedly in a voting booth what is the proper solution to a problem which he or she did not know even existed until long after it arose. Today's new problems call for study today

I think that you are wise in your decision to look around awhile before picking a husband. You can't be more than 25 or 30 and there's plenty more time to get married in. You want to know more men?
