WALLY BAKER FORSOOK FARM FOR LAW SCHOOL

Besides the chance of service to the University, there is great personal benefit gained from the holding of student offices, thinks Baker. It is, he believes, a practical school for the training of executive ability.

Some of the reforms of student government that he favors include a movement to get the student body more interested in the Co-op store, and in buying permanent decorations for such events as homecoming and Junior Week-end. Much money could be saved the A. S. U. O., he points out, if these decorations were of a permanent character, and it were not necessary to replace them annually.

While on the campus, Baker has been active in student politics. He was a freshman debater, was in charge of decorations for homecoming, chairman of the high school relay meet, and is a member of the Co-op board.

Shack Type of Auto Camps Passing, States F. L. Wright

The day of the hastily erected shack type of auto camp, brought about by the sudden popularity of auto touring, is now passing, believes Frank Lloyd Wright, internationally famous architect who recently brought an exhibition of his work to the University of Oregon school of architecture. Included in Mr. Wright's collection was a model of an auto camp or camping unit, designed in spare time, which incorporated his ideas in this field.

While construction of the units is so simple as to almost make them portable, they still are built to harmonize with out-of-door surroundings and are in keeping with the Wright idea to utilize all light and air possible for the residents.

The unit has three cabins, one of them equipped with a kitchen. An ingenious device permits air and light to come in by simply removing portions of the roof. This is also constructed so that in rainy weather the section may be raised enough to admit plenty of air, yet protect those inside from showers.

For families with small children there are a couple of enclosed yards between the structures, and space for parking is allowed on each side of the houses.

Modernistic treatment is used, yet the design is one of real practicality, with no waste of room or materials.

The models attracted considerable attention at the exhibit, and a new era in auto and outdoor camp construction is predicted by many who saw the possibilities in this type of structure. Especially enthusiastic are those people who are interested in beautifying highways and the elimination of unsightly structures in the natural out-of-doors.

WHAT SHOW TONIGHT?

While slightly inferior to "Disraeli," the film that won for Arliss the American Academy's 1930 award, "Old English" is the type of rare comedy that is not often

"Perfect Alibi" Different

Though "The Perfect Alibi," written for the English cinema by A. A. Milne, is entertainingly different in plot treatment, it is unsatisfactorily acted by an all-English cast. It is playing at the Heilig for the last time today.

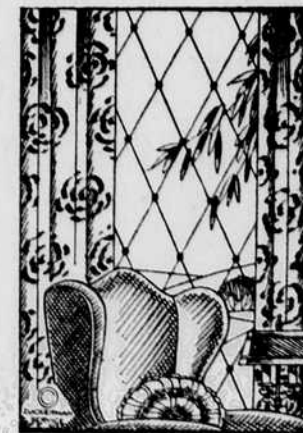

The English have evidently not reached our degree of mechanical perfection. The film scratched rather miserably. Too, there a strange self-consciousness in the pose of some of the leading people.

The plot difference consists in telling a murder mystery by letting the audience in on all the murderer's actions from beginning to end.

Colonial Has Best Picture

Far above all the rest of the current films in town, is "Old English," playing at the Colonial thea-seen on the screen. It combines a piquant and charming story by John Galsworthy, and a very intelligent transcription to the screen.

Our New Style Drapes represent the recent trend towards more vivid colors, lovely designs, and smaller patterns. Draperies soon lose their brightness and distinction, making it necessary to replace them quite frequently.

A special cast includes many of those who were in the original stage company that came to Eugene several years ago.

Charlotte Greenwood at McDonald

If names in the cast are any indicator, "Stepping Out," playing at the McDonald theatre today, should prove to be one of those plays that start with a giggle and end with hysterics.

The cast includes long-legged and agile Charlotte Greenwood, Cliff Edwards, nicely naive comic, Reginald Denny, a clever pretty boy, and Leila Hyams, a very satisfactory romantic lead player.

Caribbean Policy Is Subject of Club Debate

The new Caribbean policy of President Hoover will be attacked and defended tonight at the meeting of the Congress club at 7:30 in the College Side Inn. The trend of the government away from intervention in Central American countries has aroused much comment, and interest has centered in resulting activities in Nicaragua.

Kenneth Fitzgerald, freshman in journalism, will open the discussion with a defense of the new policy, and will advocate further extension of this recent stand of the administration.

Poems by Professor Moll Read to Group

The reading of poems from his newly published book, "Native Moments," by Prof. Ernest Moll, was exceptionally well received at an open meeting of Prose and Poetry group of Philomatele, according to Pauline Schuele, sponsor.

The reading, which was held on Sunday, "Stepping Out," playing at the McDonald theatre today, should prove to be one of those plays that start with a giggle and end with hysterics.

In addition to the poetry found in "Native Moments," Professor Moll read poems which he had not as yet titled. The book, "Native Moments" has just been placed on sale at the Co-op and bids to rival his former book, "Sedge-fire" in popularity.

Dear Friends:

"Here's a watch I want fixed before I go home. I've had it in my drawer since before Christmas. How much do you think it'll be?" asked one of the campus seniors.

Mr. Skeie picked it up and opened the case—to see what was wrong.

After the young man left, Mr. Skeie and I got to talking about this watch repairing business.

"You know," said Mr. Skeie, "most people are reluctant about taking their watches to jewelry stores unless they are sure of the firm and that they don't charge too much. A watch is so delicate they seldom realize how easy it is to ruin one."

"Yes, that's right, and they do need cleaning at least once a year."

"I wonder how many students on the campus have watches lying around that need fixing?" asked Mr. Skeie.

Well, folks, letting watches lie around doesn't help them either—that's what Mr. Skeie says, and he KNOWS.

For real reliable watch repairing and fairest prices, try Skeie's.

Yours,
TICK

"Don't Put All Your Eggs In One Basket"

LONG years ago, some sage uttered words to that effect. Since then, mankind has repeated them. And after all, it's not such bad philosophy. You know how the story goes... the single basket is smashed and there are no eggs left. But if two baskets had been used, probably at least half of the eggs would have been saved.

This is a good thing to remember in advertising. Perhaps we should say, "Don't aim all your ads at one market." Instead, seek two or three which should prove profitable, and cultivate them all in proportion to their potential buying power. Then, if one fails for a time, there are yet others to draw upon.

A campus contains people, and people are driven by human needs and wants. It should be a potential market. It is. The campus of the University of Oregon has a total population of almost 4,000 persons. They need... they want... they buy. Surely this market should be the place to provide an extra "basket." Arrange to reach it thoroughly... cultivate it... and it will repay your efforts.
