Hope for Peace

Two events of Wednesday of this week indicate that the time may not be far off when Japan must call off her aggression in China. The first was a liberal demonstration by hundreds of students of the Imperial university of Tokio against * the continuance of the "imperialistic war." The second was the public gallery laughter in a meeting of the League of Nations' council that greeted the statement of Japanese Delegate Naotake Sato when he said that Japan had no territorial ambitions

The demonstration by students indicates that all is not well within Japan, and that the military party now in control must expect strong opposition within the country to its policies. The gallery laughter is indication that world opinion is forming against the imperialistic ambitions of Japan. The two spell ultimate defeat for Nipponese plans.

A few days ago Japan unofficially proposed the abrogation of the nine-power pact and the substitution in its place of neutral demilitarized zones about China's commercial cities. The proposal rightly received a cold shoulder from the rest of the world. It was an attempt to justify Japan for her interference in China and her definite violation of provisions of the ninepower pact that guarantee the sovereignty and territorial independence of the country.

If opinion is solidly formed against Japan for violation of existing treaties-notably the nine-power pact and the pact for outlawry of war-she can not continue long in her errant ways. She will be forced to place her alleged rights in China before proper boards of arbitration. The League of Nations has not failed yet. It will not fail if contracting nations remain true to their declared policies and ideals.

To Boo Is Taboo

Two weeks ago Oregon students were challenged to stop booing at basketball games. Result: one of the best examples of good sportsmanship ever seen when two rival schools met in a close game. It can be said truthfully that there was no booing at the Oregon-Oregon State game. Once or twice a murmur started, but it was hushed long before it had a chance to become

Tonight and tomorrow Oregon students stand the test of sportsmanship again. The Webfoots take the floor at the Igloo against an impressive, league-leading team from Washington State. Oregon students in the stands must remember that their jeering comments directed at officials and players do nothing but send the visiting team back to its home campus with a terrible impression of Oregon "hospitality."

Basketball games can be won and enjoyed if booing is absent. Let's adopt as Oregon's new slogan: "To boo is taboo."

Dogs, Dawgs, Dogs

 $\mathbf{D}^{\mathrm{OGS}}$  is funny. We stopped to see some friends last night. As we sat listening to the words, some wise and some otherwise, which fluttered back and forth in the conversation, the host's shaggy collie sat in the middle of the room in front of the fireplace.

"There's Tam again, right in the middle of the room," remarked the hostess-she doesn't like dogs. "You can't keep him out when there are people around."

"Yep, he's always there," the host admitted-he likes dogs. "But he's a bit off center. He's generally squarely in front of the fireplace. That must be because you're here," addressing us, who were sitting at one side of the hearth. We moved over.

"Say, though, by golly, I believe he's not so far off at that," the host went on, the glimmer of making a discovery in his eyes. "If you line up the center of the fire-you see it's over in the west corner of the hearth where that big chunk is-and th center of Tam, I don't believe you could have done better with a compass and transit," he concluded as he slid over to the west corner of the davenport to complete his calculations.

Dogs is funny, yep.
