Husky Boredom

"MORE than 99 per cent of University (Washington) students are merely bored by communism and other radical theories," speaks the University of Washington Daily editorially to impress upon its readers that "the University is no hotbed

To us the statement is astonishing. It is inconceivable to us that there could possibly be an institution of higher education in which all but one per cent of the students are bored with political theories which are today such vital issues in world affairs.

The conclusions we must draw from the Washington editor's remarks are, either intellectual curiosity, which should be one of the tenets of every college student, is sadly lacking at the Seattle school, or, the editor is unaware of the pulse of his own campus. We are inclined to adopt the latter

It appears obvious that the Washington editor is governed by the mistaken impression that a student must wave a red flag in a communist riot, parade in a black shirt or take the stump in advocation of socialism before he is interested in these forces which now confront people of every nation.

We feel that students at Washington and other universities and colleges appreciate the importance of intellectual browsing into the workings of the various 'isms' as keenly as do Oregon students. They are issues of the day-ominous, real and threatening. It is no more than natural that classrooms be the laboratories where students—far more than one per cent of students-be anything but bored as they learn the intricacies of the movements which the United States government now faces and which we as students must face in the future.

Mountaineers near Oroville, Cal., have found a new industry-shipping ladybugs. They find them by the thousands. Here is the biggest shipment to date. The 40 boxes in the picture are estimated to contain 20 gallons of bugs at 80,000 to a quart or a total of 4,800,000. Farmers release them in their orchards and vineyards where they are the natural enemy of aphid. The lady, by the way, is Miss Tracy Brown and the men are M. L. Marders and J. H. Walker.
