

Basking in the Rain

OREGON students bask blissfully in the famous Oregon sunshine!

Bill Reinhart and Bill Hayward wrinkle their brows wondering where the dimes are coming from to finance highly probable northwest championship teams in baseball and track.

Oregon students continue to bask in the sunshine.

Worried juniors slow up plans for Oregon's far-famed Junior Week-end. Nobody interested; especially when that interest entails the payment of a $5 fee.

Oregon students continue basking.

Mature students, interested in governing themselves, see the collapse of a self-supporting student organization, the product of more than a quarter of a century of student independence.

Oregon students are still basking.

WAKE UP, WEBFOOTS! THERE'S NOTHING IN WHICH TO BASK. It's raining. In fact, it's pouring in-difference and obstinance which threaten the financial structure of Oregon's student organization—and only 925 pairs of willing hands are making any effort to stem the flood.

Where are the other 1100 registered students who read the Emerald, watch the track meets and baseball games, enjoy Junior Weekend, and engage in the numerous other activities offered by the A.S.U.O.? They are still basking in the mythical Oregon sunshine. God grant that they do not stubbornly continue to bask until the flood carries them, too, back to the student subordination and obsolete educational system of an earlier century, the inevitable result of the discontinuance of such an organization as the associated students of the University of Oregon.

Oregon State Meets a Crisis

(Oregon State Daily Barometer)

SPRING term activities seemed assured last night with the report that 1236 students had paid or promised to pay their student body fees. By no means an outstanding victory, the results do, however, show what enthusiastic Staters can accomplish in the pinches.

The results of today's action of the board of control will determine officially whether the program is to be carried on without further interruption. Serious has been the slight delay of this week and perhaps a relization of

Brockman Violin Concert Changed To Four o'Clock

The violin concert featuring Frances Brockman, which was announced Monday as to take place next Sunday at 3, has been moved on an hour in order not to conflict with a campus lecture scheduled for that hour. The program begins at 4 and will be at the Music auditorium.

The program is being given to help raise funds for Miss Brockman's trip east to compete in the national contest of the Federated Music Clubs of America to be held in Philadelphia. Miss Brockman will represent the northwest district.

Miss Brockman is appearing this evening with the Salem Philharmonic orchestra as soloist.

Next Sunday's program follows:

1. Cesar Franck .....
.....Sonata for Violin and Piano
Allegretto Moderato
Allegro
Recitative Fantasia
Allegretto poco Moso
  2. Vieuxtemps .....
.....Ballade and Polonaise
  3. Chausson ..... Poeme
  4. (a) Bloch .....Improvisation
(b) Pierne-Dushkin .....
.....Little Tich, the Clown
From "Impressions of a Music Hall"
(c) Szmanowski .....
.....Nocturne and Tarantelle
- Tickets are 50 cents and are available at the Co-op and at McMorran and Washburne.

the consequences of further delay was responsible for the recent rapid results.

The real threat lay not only in the discontinuance of the program for this term but, even more important, in the serious consequences to the future for Oregon State. Affiliations with other schools in athletic and other activity relations were in imminent peril of discontinuation. The future of activities for next year seemed endangered owing to lack of experienced students to continue their programs and to the undesirable precedent which would be established. Enrollment of graduating high school seniors in this institution next fall was imperilled.

A setback to activities could only have meant one thing—that the Beaver school would be relegated to a lower class of institutional standing. Oregon State students have chosen wisely to continue their institution in its enviable position among the larger institutions on the coast.

The future is still cloudy and much remains to be done to present a united student body front forging ahead to greater achievements for the institution. The recent rally shows what can be done. Oregon State again meets a crisis and passes on to a greater future.

Race for Editor

2. Statement of general editorial policy.
3. Policy regarding makeup of paper.
4. Financial needs of the applicant.

Seven students have announced their intentions to file for the editorship of the campus daily. They are Robert Lucas, Clair Johnson, Reinhart Knudsen, Fred W. Colvig, Bernard Clark, Bob E. Moore, and J. Almon Newton.

Peggy Chessman, George Root, and George Callas have been mentioned as likely candidates for the position of Oregon editor.

Edmond Labbe, Eldon Haberman, and Newton Stearns are expected to file for Emerald business manager. Competition for Oregon business manager seems to have hit a new low since there are no applicants as yet.

The publications committee will submit their recommendations to the executive council after April 10, following the examinations of the applicants.

Members of the publications committee are: Joseph Renner, A.S.U.O. president; William Berg, vice-president A.S.U.O.; William E. Phipps, Emerald editor; Bernard Clark, Oregon editor; George Turnbull, professor of journalism; Robert Allen, alumni secretary; Hugh E. Rosson, graduate manager; non-voting member); Orlando Hollis, professor of Law.

Our Hats Are Off to the Progressive Merchants of Eugene

Progressive merchants are successful merchants who have attained distinction in their various fields.

They realize that in order to enjoy patronage from college students they must stock quality and style merchandise at reasonable prices.

They also know that in order to sell their goods they must make known to the public the merits of their products and the services rendered by their stores—that's why they accept the Oregon Daily Emerald as a worthwhile medium in which to place their advertising—they know that the Emerald has complete coverage on the campus.

The following merchants are those who advertise in the Oregon Daily Emerald consistently and who today are enjoying the college students' patronage.
