College Failures Caused By Lack of Management

WASHINGTON STATE COLLEGE, Pullman, March 20 (Special)—"Poor management is the cause of 95 per cent of the failures in student work at college," says Frank T. Barnard, registrar at Washington State college. "The student who carefully budgets his time and sees to it that study, outside activities, and social affairs all play a balanced part in his college life, will make a success of his schooling."

"Failures are due to any number of causes," Mr. Barnard continued. "such as ill health, poor preparation in fundamental subjects in high school, too much social life, financial worry, outside work, too much time and interest in athletics, lack of interest, and poor study conditions. Many of these overlap with the poor management cause."

"If a student has acquired poor study habits in high school, they may be carried into college and handicap him for the rest of his life. Not only do they leave him without the proper tools for college work, but they lead him to place an improper emphasis in recreation."

"Also many students who have leaned heavily on their parents, come to college as their own managers and find themselves unprepared to assume their new responsibilities."

ence delegates debated distribution of electrical power. Representatives of the Portland chamber of commerce preferred selling large blocks of power at the damsite to attract large industries, while J. W. Thiessen, representing the Oregon state grange, was interested not so much in the development of large industries as seeing that the benefits went to increase comfort in rural districts.

The actual policy of the national government in distribution of Bonneville power will tend to follow the decentralized plan, E. H. Foley Jr., counsellor of the WPA, intimated.

During the open session of the conference, Mr. Foley declared that "power must be made available to the greatest number at the lowest cost. Local communities will have the first chance to utilize the power developed by great national power projects."
