

Exhibit of Student Designing Shown in Art School Gallery

Interesting because of the subject matter is the new exhibit of student work placed last week in the "little art gallery" at the art school. Coming from the California school of fine arts, the work portrays many phases of life seen only in the larger cities. In this group are water colors and lithographs of workers on high steel structures and persons in the slums and foreign quarters of the city.

Original designs for textiles, ceramics, and illustrative purposes are also included in the display. Several finished textiles were sent with the work. Particularly noticed by visitors were a "snow-capped mountain" design. Outlined in silver on a white background, the mountains are done in a cool blue-green. Other designs include oriental, nature, and geometric figures.

Portraits and character sketches outnumber the other types of pictures. The oils of a negro man and woman, and the pencil drawings of a small girl and a young woman draw one's attention.
