

Tiger Payne Advises Many-Sided Course

By BETTY JO SHOWN

Tiger Payne admitted, "I had more ambition than common sense when I came to school, I had only thirty dollars to my name!" From experience, he advises other ambitious young people to start on a more adequate sum—if self-supporting, work a year before plunging into the multitudinous activities of college.

But aside from that one mistake one glances down his record of achievements and finds little left to be desired in his college career.

Experiences Valuable

As far as doing college over again, Tiger emphatically insisted, "I wouldn't have missed a thing!" To him, each experience, whether spectacular or just hard work, was valuable and enjoyable. He heartily recommends earning part or all support—contending that working, participation in activities, and scholarship can all be handled successfully if a good start in each is established from the beginning.

Entering again, he would "cultivate good study habits from the start to build up an impressive scholarship record—always handy to fall back on when activities and work take too much time. Be aggressive enough to get a good job. I have managed to earn an average of $75 a month since I have been in school."

Too Much Politics

In reviewing his long list of activities, which includes the honoraries Skull and Dagger, Alpha Delta Sigma, Friars, Scabbard and Blade; political posts such as freshman class president and student body president; and innumerable committees, he would correct two issues. "I would listen and learn. While freshman class president I was too enthusiastic about the class and what it was doing to get a good background of student activities as a whole. The glamour wore off when I hit the 'sophomore slump' but the good solid work of the committees gave me valuable experience."

"Once a politician, always a politician" is another regrettable fact for which Tiger would compensate. "In my sophomore year I entered politics much too deeply. When one gets tabbed as a politician it is hard to shake off the reputation in other activities."

He's Satisfied

All in all, Tiger has had four years with few mistakes and practically unlimited accomplishments to his credit. Handling the jobs of student body president and house president, being a member of four major committees and numerous honoraries, supporting himself 100 per cent, he still finds time to maintain a better than B average. Oh yes, he even manages to entertain a steady girl-friend!

In looking back, he reiterated, "It has been lots of work but I wouldn't have missed any part of it!"

Patter

Have you met the rhododendron named Alice? In fact, there are two rhododendrons named Alice at the west side of the libe. They wear tin name tags. It is disconcerting. There ought only to be one Alice, or at least some sort of clarification as to just who these two Alices are, and what their connection is. Maybe they are twins; obviously they are two. One is in fuller bloom than the other. She would probably prefer to maintain her own identity. The Alices have some sort of distant relative down by Friendly hall. It has a lovely single palish pinkish blossom. It is not named Alice, though. I Looked. —Pat Erickson.
