Athletic Field Alters Face

From a muddy, rocky, and rough cow pasture of past years to the smooth, level, and firm playing surface of today is the story of the transformation of the intramural athletic field.

Fills up to six feet were made in some places this year, a complete drainage system was installed, the whole area was leveled, and a thick coat of sawdust was firmly pressed on the entire surface.

Bleachers

"Bleachers will be set into the west wall of the intramural field," declared F. A. Cuthbert, associate professor of land architecture. He and Dr. R. W. Leighton, dean and director of the school of physical education, have engineered the whole project.

"After a year when the area has settled, Oregon will have one of the best intramural fields in the Northwest," Dean Leighton said.

Track Plans

Plans for a track around the field have already been formulated, and in a short time the area will contain one football field, one cinder-covered track, two softball fields, and room enough for any other outdoor sport, Cuthbert said.

The completion of the intramural field is the last step in the development of the entire athletic area starting with Hayward field, Howe field, the football practice field, the frosh baseball field, the military marching area, and finally the intramural field, Cuthbert said.

Desk, Chair Named Oldest Furniture

The decrepit old tan desk and chair in Dr. G. E. Lussky's office is declared the oldest piece of furniture on the campus by Dr. F. G. G. Schmidt, his predecessor as head of the German department.

The now-scarred and aged furniture belonged originally to Dr. John W. Johnson, first president of the University.

Dr. Lussky smiled when asked if he used them. "The chair I use all the time, but the desk is getting rather shabby," he pointed out indicating the desk which had long since lost some of the knobs which open the drawers. "And besides," he remarked, "Dr. Schmidt still has some of his things in it."

Miss Edith Iris Pearson, '31, became a bride August 23 when her wedding to Bernard E. Stain was read in Klamath Falls.
