Refugee Invades Dorm

vasion of Poland came in September, 1939. His present whereabouts is unknown.

"I was always interested in Oregon even before I thought of coming to the United States," recalled Malkin, speaking with the typical clipped accent of Central Europeans. "When the refugee service gave me my choice of several states, I elected to come to the University of Oregon."

The short and wiry entomologist lived in Warsaw until July, 1938. While there he became interested in the hobby of his biology instructor—entomology, and especially in his collection of beetles.

He took out his citizenship papers in February, 1939, about six months after his arrival in New York by way of London and Liverpool. By the following fall he found himself completely on his own; his country, his home, and his family under the steel thumb of a ruthless invader. Eventually they escaped from the country.

Immediately upon his arrival in June of this year, he began to search for new specimens. In the last five months he has collected several thousand new insects in the vicinity of Eugene, including five recognized new species of beetles and twelve new species of spiders. He expects to find many more species, since there has been very little collecting done here.

Speaking of conditions in his former home, Malkin said, "few people in this country realize how bad conditions really are. They are forcing my people to work without pay and with little food. The Nazi police ransacked my uncle's house, taking furniture from several rooms. Lawyers can no longer practice, for there is no law but German cruelty. My sister was forced to work in a restaurant for practically nothing, and they have even renamed the familiar towns, streets, and squares after the Nazi big shots.

"Yes, I think the United States will go to war. They must go. The Americans are the only ones now who can win this war, save my country, and free my people."
