Violinist Seeks

through his two-hour concert program. But something went wrong, or seemed to go wrong, at one of his concerts in Birmingham, Ala.

Whether the artist himself noticed it, or only the public, a silent shudder passed through the folks sitting in the front rows. Here are a few observations made by the local Birmingham Post:

Possibly Optical Illusion

"Menuhin had his audience in suspense . . . I am very glad it did not happen, but it looked a little like Yehudi Menuhin, the great violinist, was going to lose his pants when he performed Thursday night at the Temple Theater. I suppose it was really an optical illusion. Probably the position in which the violinist held himself had something to do with it. Anyway, there was quite a bit of discussion about it around me. Most of it centered around what the great violinist would say if the calamity happened. Someone advanced the theory that if Menuhin were playing a great classical piece when the pants came dropping down, that he would stop, pull his trousers back up, and with an austere 'Pardon' continue his rendition. But, if he were playing a lighter selection, he would simply say, 'Well I'll be darned.' One lady spectator, a first class violinist herself, said she knew of no ethics covering such a situation. She said if the audience was properly impressed by what he was playing they should not notice what was happening to his trousers anyhow. Anyway, as I say, I'm glad it didn't happen."

Oregon Victory Bell

bun said, that the Betas recovered the bell. They learned through this "leak," that the ATOs had taken the bell several weeks ago, and had hidden it in an undisclosed place. As soon as they found out about it, they went and got it. "There was really nothing to it," he explained.

Recovered

After he had recovered the bell, Rathbun called Bill Fugit, president of the ATO house. Fugit disclaimed knowledge of its whereabouts. When Rathbun announced that the bell was again in the Beta's possession, Fugit at first refused to believe him. Later he called back, saying that he had further information that the bell was still where the ATOs had put it.

Shortly after dinner last night, however, the Betas removed the bell to a "safer" location.
