In thinking of spring and the romantic atmosphere created by flowers, birds, and sunshine, we are reminded that there most likely will be additional love-triangles for us to worry about. Day must have been thinking similarly when he wrote "Between Two Loves."

I gotta love for Angela,
I love Carlotta, too.
I no can marry both o' dem,
So wot I gonna do?

While still in a poetic mood we want to tell you how surprised we were to learn that our old friend "now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party," is actually a poem. It's called "Typewriter Song," and the author is Edward Meade Robinson.

"A penny for your thoughts," isn't so new either. It's in "The Proverbs of John Heywood," the earliest collection of English colloquial sayings, and Jonathan Swift also used it in the "Introduction to Polite Conversation."

Finally, we think you ought to be interested in the definition of MAN, given in Ambrose Bierce's "Devil's Dictionary."

"An animal so lost in rapturous contemplation of what he thinks he is as to overlook what he indubitably ought to be. His chief occupation is extermination of other animals and his own species, which, however, multiplies with such insistent rapidity as to infest the whole habitable earth and Canada."

Let us be thankful for the fools. But for them the rest of us could not succeed.

We exaggerate misfortune and happiness alike. We are never either so wretched or so happy as we say we are.

Give Sight to a Dancing Fool

I have, perhaps, just come into the sunshine, and I look up the street and see the old red coat ahead of me. She will walk up three blocks, I know, then over one and up three more and turn into the stone house and shut the door.

("And are your shoes all shined, your smile fixed on?")
Before, of course, I could meet her and we would talk and smoke our cigarettes over the kitchen table.

Earl Holmer is a typical big shot ala Duck.

He looks rather like Clark Gable, talks rather like John Kieran, and acts a lot like Mickey Mouse. Upon the subject of women he is profuse.

"They get in my hair," he spoke darkly, in measured sonorous tones. "They take too much time. I have to study."

This frank and utterly bald admittance knocked the questioner of her pins. Did he think women as a race are necessary, she asked tremulously.

The Man frowned and conceded slowly, "I would say that without them there would not be many people, so taking all and all into account, I would say that women as a race are necessary."

"Now don't get me wrong. I'm not a woman hater," he soothed. "I just don't feel much of anything about them. I don't have an ideal girl. I never have. I suppose I'll marry some day, and when I do I'll pick a gal kinda strong to help with the spring plowin'. Plowin's mighty important."

"I have a few improvements to suggest," he offered. "I think that washing her face and combing her hair improves any young miss, whether the Oregon gal thinks she needs it or not."

"I would say that women's place is either in the home or out of it, depending upon circumstances. It seems indubitable (here comes Kieran) that many women will be in the house. I view with alarm recent tendencies leading women to participate in business and government. I don't like to deal with women in business because they are rough and will make you all black and blue."

As the time for that "two o'clock" drew near, Earl Holmer grinned and said, "Oh, say, any reference to persons living and dead is purely intentional. If you

This is just after the rain, I think, and the old red coat goes on.

We meet now and then, naturally. We smile, I light her cigarette. The smoke come up and makes another screen before our faces.

("You are a fool.") I am, perhaps, and so I play the monkey.

What can she say to me? Can she just simper of forgotten things? There is really nothing either of us can say and so we say nothing. We blow our smoke and she will not look at me.

("You did not plan this right. You did not have your entrance and your exit properly considered. Are your words, perhaps, the correct thing now? Or should you change your phrases?") I don't know. I pretend to work and do nothing.

There were four walls to every room, I thought, and then she showed me one that had no wall at all. But I can't go here and there knocking down walls.

("Suppose you never built them? Suppose there was a building once which no one ever planned? Would it be liveable?")

More so than now, I guess. But it's impossible. I tried to build my room of an old red coat, black hair, and coffee across a table. Now it's resolved into a screen of smoke. I can still see her through it but it makes no difference.

The old red coat, black hair, and coffee walk up the street and I do nothing. I shall go now but not without the screen.

think I've sat here for an hour answering your questions without meaning people in particular - you're nuts!"

Which statement leaves us wondering.
