

Deady Grows Older, Fuller

By RUTH KAY COLLINS

Something new has been added—another floor to Deady hall, this one making a grand total of seven. Graduate assistants for the math department and supplies for the biology department will be stored on the new floor, which is between floors two and three.

Dr. E. E. DeCou, professor of mathematics, who has had his offices in Deady for forty years, remembers when there were only four stories and rooms with 20 foot ceilings in the oldest building on the campus. He also recalls the traditional day on which the juniors would try to tear down the sophomore flag from the tower of Deady.

Because the battle became more fierce each year, it was finally abandoned and a day dedicated to interclass games and campus improvements took its place. It was customary for the engineers to lay down a section of sidewalk from Deady to Kincaid street and names of the classes who participated in this tradition can be seen on the cement today. That day was known as Junior Weekend.

Produce

Deady, which is modeled after one of the famous French buildings of that period, was built not only by money but by corn, hogs, eggs, wheat, and other produce. In order for Eugene to have the University it was required that they provide the land and raise a building worth $50,000 on it. To obtain such a large sum in such a small community as Eugene was at that time it was difficult; therefore, the farmers pledged not only their money but also their produce which Thomas Hendricks, founder of the First National bank in Eugene and one of the founders of the University sold.

Enough money was procured to construct the building but not enough to pay the workmen. Henry Villard, founder of the Northern Pacific railroad and for whom Villard is named, telegraphed the amount needed to pay the labor cost and saving the building from being sold to pay its bills. Mr. Villard gave other gifts to the University for the science laboratory and the library as well as aiding the initial campaign to build Deady.

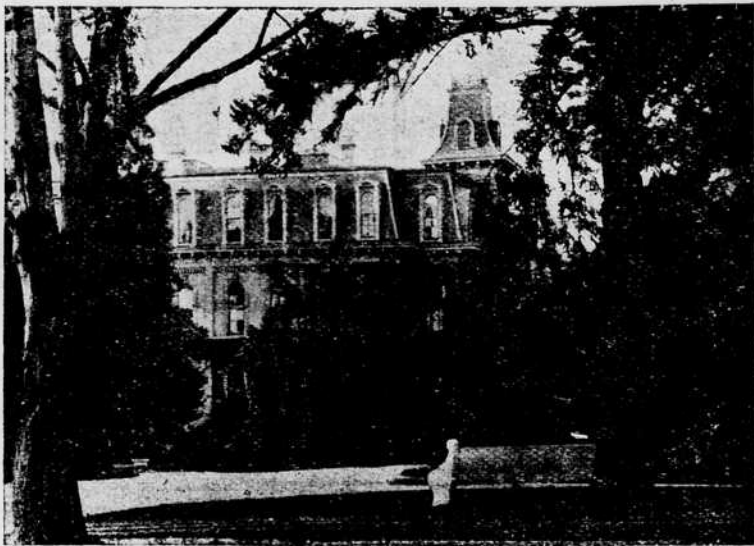

Sole Building

Deady served not only as the sole building for University instruction but also held high school and for a time grade school classes. The Dean of Women forbade women students from climbing to the third story because of the steep stairway.

The entire upper floor was used for assemblies in after years, when Deady became a science building, the waste space was utilized by remodeling the building. The spiral stairs were taken out and the present ones put in; on each landing offices were built and mezzanines put in the biology department.

Studying Pre-Medics

At the University of Oregon he is studying pre-medics and his work has placed him well above the requirements for the honor roll.

He recalled the happenings after Pearl Harbor, the accusing fingers pointed at him. He felt that people were calling him a spy or saboteur. He recalled how his friends stood by him magnificently when the crisis came and he is grateful to them for this.

He asks the question, "What makes an American? Is it skin color?" All Nisei (Americans of Japanese ancestry) are asking this question. The Nisei can't answer this question; the American public only can answer this question.

He stated that he was not trying to criticize what the organization was doing but he was trying to show the true feelings of the Nisei. He offered himself for any service he might be to the organization.

He completed his letter by saying that he believed that he was reflecting the attitudes of the thousands of Nisei who hope that they will be accepted for what they are—real Americans.

After a series of many petitions he managed to graduate from the University with an economics major. He then kissed-off the Land of the Free and enrolled in the Tokyo Imperial university as a graduate student. Completing his studies here, he was assigned a position in the broadcasting corporation of Japan's foreign division.
