

Brawny Jim Bronson Plays Southern 'Wreck'

By AMY PRUDEN

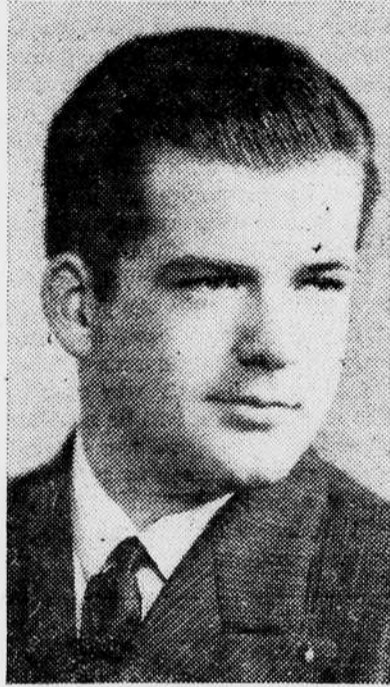

"The southern accent of the 'The Wreck' ought to come in handy at Fort Benning," laughed Jim Bronson as he sat tipped back in Horace Robinson's chair at the drama studio and attempted to describe his role in the newest University theater play, "My Sister Eileen."

Jim portrays a bronzed and hairy ex-football player from Georgia Tech who manages to spend most of his time exercising in shorts, hocking pictures, taking sly nips from a bottle, or expertly ironing pleated skirts. "One outstanding feature of this play," grinned Jim, "is the fact that for the first time I am actually working with some of my fraternity brothers . . . six Sigma Chis in this play."

Starting in as a journalism major, Jim became involved in the drama department and since then has held down such roles as Carlson, the mean bully in "Of Mice and Men"; Mungo, the prissy, straight-laced elder in "Wingless Victory"; Chester Binney, a farce character on a small town "dope" in "The Whole Town's Talking"; a common straight role of a business man in "Watch on the Rhine"; and the flustered politician in "Of Thee I Sing." Jim says that the most fun of all was his role in "Of Thee I Sing" because of the noise and music which surrounded the big production.

Besides his acting, Jim designed the set for "My Sister Eileen" and after the war plans to either work on scene designing or play writing.

"My Sister Eileen" will be Jim's last appearance on the University stage since he will graduate this spring, and plans to have his tonsils out as soon as the show closes.

However, it seemed to be the consensus of opinion that Jay Allen was specifically interested in cutting one attractive journalism student, Ruth Austin, from the herd. She is now Mrs. Jay Allen—and they have a son, Michael.

A Sigma Delta Chi member, and always a good mixer and talker—Allen was liked for many of the qualities that have made him an outstanding journalist—a sense of humor, great-working ability—and excellent reportorial ability.

He is the co-author of "All the Brave"—with Ernest Hemingway, Elliot Paul and Luis Quintanilla—and has been working on a book titled, "The History of Foreign Intervention in the Spanish Civil War."

With three days of rest, Begleries will be in fine mettle and will probably open again the invaders. Little Nick hurt his hand in the WSC contest and may give way to Saltzman or Bubalo. The rest of the nine will remain the same combination as have been starting the games thus far.

Invaders Tripped

The Bubalometer figures show that John's home run was his only hit in four attempts at the dish, although he is still clubbing the tablet at well above a .500 average.

Rockey's best bet was a sinking curve ball which he always used when he was in the hole—which was frequent.
