

Pi Phis Prove Pigskin Packers

The old campus has changed. Yep, it sure has changed. This personage has seen some weird doings in his two summers of existence, but if anybody had told him that girls actually played football at Oregon, he would have banged them on the head with his rattle.

Seeing is believing, however, and when the bizarre spectacle is unfolded before a fellow's eyes not once, but three or four times, he just naturally has to come around and own up to the facts. You don't believe it even yet? Well, the place is the lawn west of the libe; the time is any evening either before or after supper, and the players—well, hold your breath, fellas—the players are some of those cuddly, feminine-appearing, demure (?) Pi Phis, no less.

Furthermore, these ardent Amazons don't just stand there, mouths agape, making lady-like passes at the ball accompanied by even more lady-like yelps and screams. Two or three of 'em can sling that spheroid like Sammy Bough himself. And a couple can kick so adroitly and vigorously that the soldiers who generally form their companions and opponents have to scramble backward like fury to pull down that pill.

It appears that a darn good six-man—pardon me, six-women—team might be made up of some of these lusty lassies. Bobby Vandeneynde has the makings of a good quarterback, and a sturdy forward wall might be composed of Doris Laken, Dorothy Coykenrall, and Pat Swanson. "Blocking back" posts might go to Pat McCormick and Margaret Cordon. With this team Mr. Stagg, the "grand old man of football" would lose 20 years in as many seconds.

The first yearbook published by a military organization on the University of Texas campus will come out in mid-February when the University naval ROTC distributes its 70-page annual.

They like to read them, too.
