

'Fathah' Bailey's Boys End 'Stand'

The disbanding of "Fathah Bailey and his Crew" writes the last chapter on the life of the first and only all-army band at the University of Oregon.

The army came to the University in 1943. Men from every part of the country, engineering, air corps and language students, were housed in the available dormitories. One thing some of them had in common was a talent for music and from their scattered rooms came the mellow tones of trombones and the blare of trumpets.

The unharmonious results hurt the sensitive ears of Owen Bailey, a talented musician from Chattanooga, Tennessee, who decided to get these musicians together and have them all play the same tune at the same time. Thus "Fathah Bailey and his Crew" came into existence.

After a few rehearsals, Bailey's boys were scheduled to play for the opening assembly of the school year. The band then consisted of four saxophones, three trumpets, three trombones, drums, and piano. The new band was in acclaim from the first.

The boys had only one day a week to rehearse, and gave generously of their precious free time. No money was ever involved with this band; they played because they loved to play. At its peak, the band consisted of fifteen men and two vocalists, Sue Welch and George Barker.

The brass section consisted of Bob Stotlar, Merle Getchell, John Sheviak, Walter Hayes, and Fred Patterson. Sax section was "Ace" Fehlberg, Jack Blumenthal, James Scurlock, Gail Myers, Pat Hagameyer, and Carl Gutmann; and the rhythm section featured Ralph Sutton on the piano, and "Whitey" White on the drums. Sutton once played with Jack Teagarden and White had his own band in Nebraska; Blumenthal played with Louie Prima and Fehlberg with the Purdue swing band in Illinois. Owen Bailey played with Bill Sawyer's band in Tennessee.

Saturday night, February 12, "Fathah Bailey and his Crew" sounded their last downbeat at the army-co-op mixer. With Rice and Sutton gone, Barker, Bailey and Blumenthal accepted for aviation cadet training and Stotlar, Sheviak and Fehlberg graduating, the band is being disbanded.

Bailey and his boys built up an enthusiastic audience here at Oregon and the army and civilians look forward to another such organization to take their place.

Dean Has Activity Blanks for Townees

All girls who are not in regular living organizations should come to the dean of women's office as soon as possible to fill out an activity blank. Girls in dormitories or sororities will fill out the blanks through their houses.

The purpose of these blanks is to have material on hand with which to give references for jobs, enlisting in any women's branch of the service, and to give a record of every coed's college activities.

Western Reserve University school of medicine celebrates its hundredth anniversary October 27.
