

Nurse Recalls Experiences In Army Service Overseas

By JEANETTE GRANT

Welcomed back to the infirmary nursing staff after serving four years with the army's 46th division, Miss Leota Bradley in her starched white uniform and cap gives no visible indications of her experiences in the African and European war zones.

Miss Bradley took her nurses training in St. Vincents hospital in Portland, then spent three years with the University of Oregon infirmary before entering the service.

In 1940 she enlisted and was stationed at Fort Lewis for a year before joining the 46th, a division which was started by Colonel J. Guy Strohm and Lt. Colonel Harriet Dickson. The unit was started at the University of Oregon and recruited 100 nurses, most of whom were Oregon women; a smaller group included out-of-state nurses taking training in Oregon, and the remainder of the unit consisted of 65 officers, mostly doctors, and a large detachment of enlisted men.

North Africa

After one year of basic training at Fort Riley, Kansas, the unit went to Oran, North Africa, where they set up a hospital. The 46th did not arrive until after Rommel's break-through so little action was seen. At one time the hospital had 1500 patients, mostly American, and a few Italian malaria victims.

Miss Bradley said that the malaria was pretty well under control when they arrived. This was due to the work of men who had landed before them, who had wiped out most of the mosquito breeding places and improved the sanitary conditions.

The hospital, consisting only of a series of tents, presented many difficulties; nevertheless, the regular procedure of an average hospital was carried on. The personnel lived in tents, and the enlisted men improvised the only two showers in camp for the nurses. Sanitation was very good considering the conditions under which they had to operate.

Barracks Hospital

Leaving Africa in September, 1944, the division went to southern France. They landed in Saint Tropez bay, and traveled in convoy to Besancone, where they established another hospital.

Instead of tents they were housed in barracks, composed of stone buildings. They converted stables and tents into extra space to take care of 3200 French soldiers.

Taking care of the soldiers behind the French 1st Army was their new task; however, at one time they had 2000 Russian men that had been liberated, to care for. Most of the Russians had tuberculosis.

In France, Captain Bradley had the opportunity to see some of the country, as they took sections of her group on tours. She took trips to Paris and Versailles before leaving.

Having enough points for discharge Miss Bradley is back in the old routine; however, many of her friends were pulled out of the division and sent to the South Pacific. A few were sent home with her, and the remainder are on their way home now.
