(Continued from page two) work, especially that of examinations. Instead of pretending that the exam is a test of student knowledge, let them openly admit that it is nothing more than a contest for grades.

With that admission, they could drum up big scale business, and myriads of students would flock to take exams, pummelling the unfit in their hurry. Advertise. That's the cue: post huge posters announcing that an academic contest is to be held with grades as prizes.

For example, the literature department could conduct a contest offering, say, five A's, three B's, seven C's, and so forth as prizes for the winning entries—and every one a winner. They might use the following: "Complete in twenty-five words, or less, 'I like Rabelais because . . . ' Originality, not fancy penmanship will win." The field is limitless.

Then, too, they could take a hint from the quiz contests continuously floating around in the ether, or air, or wherever it is that they continuously float around. They could usher a student into a room and ask him a question. If he answers it properly, they could very easily say, "All right, now you have a D: do you want to try for a D plus?"

With just a wee bit of imagination, we could really get the educational ball spinning like mad. The trouble is with the educators; they ought to get hep, be modern. What's the matter, Prof, don't you read the magazines, or listen to the radio?

Housemothers Find

Another Newcomer
Enjoying her first year as a housemother, is Mrs. Dora Smith at Highland house. Mrs. Smith was very attractive with her white hair set off by a stunning black dress. In a quiet voice she explained that her duties were "just as a hostess for the girls."

"I am interested in anything they are doing," she said, including in her statement such things as the girl's volleyball intramurals, and the float for the noise parade for which the girls won a gold cup.

"Of course I think we have the nicest group of girls anywhere," she said enthusiastically. The 30 girls in the house do all their own housework, and help in the kitchen.

Mrs. Smith added that she didn't see how they manage to do all that they do and still keep their grades at a high level.
