

Senators To Study Airplane Accidents

WASHINGTON, Jan. 13 (AP)—The Civil Aeronautics Board will be called before the Senate commerce committee Tuesday as part of a congressional study of the airplane accident situation.

Demands were made in both senate and house for an investigation of air accidents as the senate commerce committee prepared to open an inquiry into safety precautions. Senator Brewster, R., Me., declared "People are getting afraid to fly." Representative Rivers, D., S. C., said the "American people are horrified and scared to death."

Brewster, member of the commerce committee, said "popular confidence" in flying is being lost.

While the senate committee's questioning of the civil aeronautics board, headed by chairman James M. Landis, is expected to touch on the safety requirement set up for civil aviation, both commercial and private, house members suggested that they also should undertake an inquiry.

Six Antarctic Fliers Safe After Crash

ABOARD U. S. S. MT. OLYMPUS, Jan. 13 (AP)—Calm self-discipline and the leadership of an iron-man captain were credited Monday with saving the lives of six Navy men, rescued 13 days after a plane crash that killed three of their fellows in the icy wilderness of Antarctica.

The survivors were brought back by air Sunday to the Byrd expedition seaplane tender Pine Island, which their PBM Mariner had left Dec. 30 on a routine photographic expedition.

The traditional navy salute was piped and a non-regulation but enthusiastic cheer from all hands sounded as Capt. Henry H. Caldwell, commanding officer of the Pine Island and leader of the castaways, once again set foot on the deck of his ship.

A Fault
"There is only one thing the matter with her, though," the manager whispered furtively so Sharon wouldn't hear.

"Whazzat," I eagerly hissed.
"Sharon has arthritis during the winter months," the manager confessed. "Her joints swell horribly."
"Oh, that's too bad," I said with feeling.

"New York has a different climate from Oregon," the manager continued. "She was made in New York, you know."

"She was!" I exclaimed . . . "Oh yes, I suppose she was."

Sharon Is Glad
"I know Sharon is pleased with her new honor," the manager concluded, "and will be very interested in the final outcome."

Turning to go out the door I gave Sharon a right handed wink, and I swear she returned the compliment. Her platinum blonde hair and perfect figure constitute a combination that is hard to beat.

For all the fellas who haven't met Sharon, they can see her at any hour of the day or night in the front window of the Westgate shop. She's the slick chick on the right . . . and she's sure cute.
