

Editor Claims Unity Need Essential in New Germany

By VIRGINIA FLETCHER

A unification of the German economy is essential for the satisfactory restoration of the country's self-support, Philip H. Parrish, editor of the Oregonian editorial page, declared Tuesday evening when speaking at Condon hall to an audience of an estimated 200 people.

Parrish was one of the group of 12 American editors sent to Europe by the war department last October to study the problems of the occupied areas. Describing his observations on the present conditions in those countries, Parrish said that the editors were agreed that German economy should be developed as a unit even if it meant a reorganization of the present occupation zones.

Unity Next Step

The United States and Great Britain have recently coordinated their two zones to attempt an economic unit, he pointed out, but France and Russia are unwilling to cooperate in such a venture. Nevertheless, some kind of an inter-zone union will have to be made before Germany is again self-sufficient.

"We have gone farther in launching freedom and independent government of the German people than any other occupying country," Parrish stated. Yet our military regime has met with misunderstanding and criticism both in Germany and at home, he said. The United States needs a better trained, better experienced, and better disciplined group of men to operate our government of occupation. Our army was not prepared for the political task it was handed in Germany, Parrish said.

Toured Europe

The group of editors spent a month in Europe, visiting Berlin, Munich, Berchtesgaden, Hof, Bamberg, Stuttgart, Pforzheim, Karlsruhe, and Heidelberg. In addition they spent two days in the British zone of occupation, two days in Vienna, a day in Trieste, two in Rome, and three in Paris.

During the trip Parrish sent letters to the Oregonian which were published under the name of "A Better Home." These letters have been compiled into a booklet, copies of which were distributed at the lecture.

Parrish's speaking engagement on the campus was arranged by Sigma Delta Chi, men's journalism honorary. He was introduced by George Turnbull, dean of the school of journalism.

Housing Search On for 'D-Day'

"Students who plan on having their fathers down for the annual Dad's Day weekend of February 14-15 should start working immediately on the housing problem," Bob Matteson, Dads' Day housing chairman, has announced.

A careful check of the leading hotels has revealed that they are partly reserved in advance on Dads' Day weekend, with a few rooms available if reservations are made now.

"Through the kind cooperation of civic groups and townspeople," Matteson said, "the housing committee has secured numerous private residences for housing fathers for the weekend at reasonable rates."

Students who have not made reservations for their fathers are urged to do so immediately, or if interested in private housing should contact Bob Matteson at the Alpha Tau Omega house, phone 703.
