Vets Not to Report Reserve Drill Pay

Neither national guard nor naval reserve drill pay need be reported by veterans as a part of their earnings, M. J. Thompson, veterans administration training officer in this area, announced today.

This ruling clears up doubts of many Oregon veterans drawing subsistence while taking education or job training under the G. I. bill. Their combined "productive labor" earnings and subsistence cannot exceed the $175 and $200 monthly ceiling. Many veterans have been undecided whether to report reserve drill pay as a part of their earnings.

The VA's national solicitor has ruled that national guard drill pay and that received by members of the organized naval reserves for drill, including flight duty, are not "compensation for productive labor" within the meaning of section two, public law 679.

However, pay received by naval reservists during their annual cruise has been ruled as earnings from labor and must be reported as a part of monthly wages, Thompson pointed out.

In 1895, there was one professor for every fourteen students at the University of Oregon.

Embryo Lawyers Set Mock Trials

"It's a pure case of homicide involving self-defense." This might be the argumentative oath of a first-year law student concerning the case of the State of Hollis vs. Roger Week, one of several cases to be argued by first-year law students before the law school's moot court from February 14 to 21.

Arguments slated for competitive tongue lashing by contesting counsels range from larceny and criminal trespass, as in the case of the State of Hollis vs. John Driscoll, to fraudulent contracts, as involved in William Donald vs. General Supply company.

The four best teams of two will be selected by the court chiefly on the basis of oral argument. Preparation of case briefs is minor. Eight winners will be split into two teams to compete next term before a court composed of faculty members of the Oregon Bar association, a book prize will be awarded to the victors.

The class of 1879 at the University of Oregon had six members, three men and three women.

Girl Hits Ceiling; Janitor Astounded

Freshman women are stronger than you think! One of the Fundamentals I PE classes, exercising violently in the heretofore fool-proof men's gymnasium, managed to do in one day what the men have never done.

A pretty coed, conscientiously doing her best in a game of kickball, took a healthy wind-up and kicked the ball straight up. It landed on the light, and fixture and all crashed to the floor, leaving only a small wire dangling from the ceiling.

The janitor took one startled look and said, "F'r 20 years the boys have been playing in here, and nothin' like this has ever happened before!"

Reed President Here

Dr. Peter H. Odegard, president of Reed college, will speak to the Political Science club at 4 p.m. Thursday in alumni hall, Gerlinger. The subject of his speech is "Public Relations as a Tool of Administration."

Anyone interested is invited to attend.
