for many of its services in the E. T. O. The reason given by military authorities was they did not want the American soldiers to get used to expect services rendered on a plain gratis basis.

Army Justice

Movements to put some sanity and a thread of continuity into army justice have long been under way. Last week Secretary of War Patterson approved most of the recommendations for revision of military justice. These recommendations were drawn up by a special committee from the American Bar association.

Changes to be made in military justice include: defendants are given the power to compel the attendance of witnesses; qualified enlisted men can be used on general and specific courts martial; the defense attorney must be a lawyer if the trial judge advocate is; general courts need not order the dismissal of an officer convicted of drunkenness nor need they sentence a soldier convicted of rape to death or life imprisonment, as at present.

Some of these proposals do not go far enough but all concerned will probably agree that it is "about time" for some movement toward a sane overall policy in the administering of military justice.
