

Joan' Tryouts Set Tonight at Studio

By JANICE KENT

Final try-outs for the cast of the University theater's May production, Maxwell Anderson's "Joan of Lorraine," will be held this evening in the drama studio. Those interested who will not be able to attend these try-outs should make an appointment with E. L. Clark, director. Marilyn Wherry will act as assistant director.

Miss Grey, who characterizes Joan of Lorraine in the play with in a play, and Jimmy Masters, the stage manager, are the two leading characters.

Masters is a practical man of the world. He agrees with the playwright that Joan should be portrayed as an honest, good woman, but not particularly saintly.

Miss Grey, however, insists that Joan is an idealistic, unyielding crusader, never compromising with the shallower standards and corrupted politics of her time. Miss Grey herself reflects some of these virtues. The main conflict of the play exists between Masters and the leading lady.

The cast consists of 22 members. The five feminine roles are minor with the exception of Miss Grey, who also plays Joan. Each player will portray two characters, the modern stage player and the person that the player represents.

Put Off Piggling

The cooperation of University students is urgently needed during the rush hours, the manager insists. The calls will go through when the operators have time. But authorities suggest, don't pose as a fireman just to get a date; someone's house may be burning down.
