DUCK TRACKS

Some 1500 fans braved a two and a half hour drizzle yesterday in watching the Ducks fall before the Washington Huskies 6-4 at Howe field and in so doing proved once and for all that

Oregon is very definitely a three-sport school. King Football has long been the collegiate athletic boss according to experts and national publications, and during the past ten years basketball has graduated into the Mr. Big class as well. Little, however, has ever been accredited to baseball in the college ranks as a No. 1 attrac-

Such is not the case at Oregon. Attendance during past seasons and thus far this year a definitely show that Oregon students show just as much interest in the horsehide campaigns as they do in football and basketball. And that is in no way a discredit to football and basketball, but rather a laurel to college baseball as played at Oregon.

During the first four conference games the attendance ranged between 3000-4000 per contest. Yesterday rain descended an hour before game time and continued throughout the game. At none of the five games has the paid attendance (those other than students) exceeded 300.

Student Attendance Hit 3500

Approximately 3500 students, therefore, turned out to see Buck Bailey's Washington State Cougars perform each afternoon. And in yesterday's rain some 1200 or 1300 showed their faces. Contrast this with WSC's showing at Oregon State with about 1500 on hand or against Washington in Seattle where, according to the Cougars, only about 800 appeared for the ball game.

The University of Oregon and the Oregon students can well take pride in such turnouts. The success of college athletics lies not in a concentration on one or two big sports but in a well-rounded program that includes a great deal of interest in many sports.

Many schools emphasize football to the exclusion of all else. Many others feature only basketball. Some double their emphasis on football and track. Few can boast the equally distributed interest as shown in the Northwest, and especially here at Oregon, in all major sports. Admittedly winning baseball has been a contributing factor, but in return it might be argued that student support has been a contributing factor in winning baseball teams.

Baseball Compares Favorably With Other Sports

. The interest in and success of Oregon baseball teams is especially refreshing when viewed in the light of the present controversy over professionalism in college athletics. No attempt is made to whitewash baseball on this charge, but it is an accepted fact that baseball is lilly white when compared with basketball and even more so when compared with football.

This year college baseball is stepping into its due recognition with a national playoff following the regular season. This is indicative of increased emphasis and interest in college baseball in the future.

It is a cause for considerable school pride that such an attitude toward baseball has existed on this campus for many years. Oregon's baseball coaches-Billy Rinehart and Hobby Hobson, baseball teams, and students alike have given to the University an outstanding institution in the form of baseball.

PCC Officials Meet in San Francisco

All eyes are focused in San Francisco this week for the meeting of Pacific Coast conference officials. No. 1 subject is the planning of a four-year football schedule for the PCC schools. Recent attempts on the part of southern schools to ease the northern brothers off the schedule and the current emphasis on intersectional games will be amply aired with more than a few heated verbal exchanges on top.

On hand to represent Oregon are Grid Coach Jim Aiken and Assistant John Warren, both of whom flew south Saturday night, and Athletic Director Leo Harris, who moved in from his home at Carmel. All three are known as scrappers who will back down from no one. Oregon is certainly well represented. The preservation of a well-knit conference, however, depends upon co-operation from other northern schools as well and a realization on the part of southern schools that the present intersectinal boom will not last forever.
