

Alan Button, Dauphin of Lorraine Combines Drama With Medicine

In addition to graduating in biology (pre-med) this term and working as an orderly at Sacred Heart hospital, Alan Button assumes the major role of the Dauphin, Charles the Seventh, in the University theatre presentation of the current Broadway success, "Joan of Lorraine." Button appears on the Guild Hall stage for the first time Friday evening as a transfer student from the University of Washington. He also attended Carroll College in Helena, Montana.

Button plans to enter medical school in the future. He enjoys drama work as a diversion to his scholastic activities.

Dauphin a Weak Character

The actor finds the Dauphin a weak character—selfish, mercenary, and petulant. The ruler is interested only in his own gains and those of his nation as long as they increase the contents of his purse. He supports Joan and her ideas while they are most profitable to him and listens to her enemies Tremoille, the corrupt court treasurer, and the hypocritical Archbishop of Rheims, when they have more to offer him personally. He has no real belief in Joan or anything else. He is pleasure-loving and childish. He has no will of his own but often repeats that he is "tired of being told what to do."

When the Duke of Burgundy offers Charles 100,000 crowns to stop Joan from the intended siege of Paris, which the English hold, he is willing to sell the unity of his nation and Joan's safety. Joan wonders why God wished him to be crowned. The Dauphin replies, "I wondered that myself when you first came to me, but you explained it to me very convincingly at the time. And now that I'm to be made King, and practically am King, I tell you I shall do what I please . . ." This attitude dominates the Dauphin's character. In the end he collaborates with the English and gives Joan up to them.

Button likes the play and feels that it is one of Maxwell Anderson's best plays.
