

Louis Adamic Lectures Here November 4

Louis Adamic, noted author of such works as "America: A nation of Nations," and "My Native Land" will be the second speaker on the assembly series sponsored by the Educational Activities board.

His speech, entitled "Tolerance is not Enough" is slated for 7:30 p.m. November 4, in McArthur court.

Adamic left his native Yugoslavia at the age of 14. He worked in factories, mills, restaurants in many parts of the United States and served in the U.S. Army in the first World War, coming to know America more intimately than many Americans.

The American Mercury was the first publication to accept one of his articles, and after this many more articles and a first book were published. He was enabled by a Carnegie three-year grant-in-aid to travel through the United States interviewing the people and becoming further acquainted with America.

No admission will be charged for the lecture.

founded in 1932 in memory of Adelaide Alsop Robineau, famed Syracuse ceramist, has been an important factor in the revival of interest in ceramics in this country.

The exhibition includes 247 examples of ceramic sculpture and pottery selected from the eleventh annual ceramics show of the Syracuse Museum of Fine Arts.

In 1937, this exhibition received international recognition when it was officially invited to exhibit in England, Denmark, Sweden, and Holland.

The Art News says of this show, "The resumption (following the war) of the National Ceramics Exhibition, which reopens after a five year interval, is of special significance. It reunites artists from all over the country, has attracted over $2,000 in prizes, and as a touring show has been widely bid for throughout the coming year." or duplicates are available.

Most of the works are for sale or duplicates are available.

The graduate class in museum technique is managing the presentation of this exhibit.
