

Former Coach Faces Charges

Richard S. Smith, ex-University of Oregon football coach, was among those sued last week by First National Bank stockholders.

A series of lawsuits totaling $273,160 was filed in the county clerk's office against the First National Bank of Eugene and Richard Shore Smith, former president of the bank. A Walter Camp All-American at Columbia university, Smith was Oregon football coach in 1904.

The litigation grew out of the sale of the bank on December 5, 1945 to Transamerica, holder of control in 45 Oregon banks. The Eugene bank thereby became affiliated with, but not a branch of the First National Bank of Portland.

Paid Only Half

Twelve capital stockholders alleged that the directors conspired with Transamerica Corporation to give them about half as much as their stock is worth. They also allege that they only received $220 a share for their holdings in the Eugene bank although Transamerica Corporation was offering $412 a share.

In identically-worded suits, the plaintiffs charged that negotiations for the sale of the bank between the directors and E. B. McNaughton, representative of Transamerica "culminated in an offer by the Transamerica Corporation to purchase the stockholders' holdings at $412 a share.

Price Not Revealed

"The directors of the bank did not conceal from the minority stockholders the amount which the Transamerica Corporation was willing to pay for stock in the bank.

"They (the directors) made an agreement that they would receive an increased price for their stock and stock which they controlled if the stock holdings of the balance of the stock holders could be purchased at a lesser price."

AAA Driftwood Exhibit to Open

An exhibition of driftwood in the sculpture studio display room will be open until Friday of this week.

Presented by the school of architecture and allied arts, well-displayed pieces show the results of a field trip to the coast by the upper division sculpture class. Experience in form and texture are highlighted by the use of shadow forms appearing with each piece of driftwood so that a combination of form in space relates to reflected form.

The Scalamandre textile show in the main gallery of the same building closes Thursday and is open from 1 to 5 p.m. daily. The driftwood exhibition is open all day and Friday will be the last day for showing.
