

Henry Wallace Due Next Week

Controversial Henry Wallace will speak in McArthur court next Tuesday at 3 p.m. under the sponsorship of the University assembly committee. No classes will be dismissed for the speech.

Eugene will be one of the scheduled stops on the two-day tour of Wallace in Oregon. He will also talk in Coos Bay, Corvallis, and Portland.

Wallace has been a controversial figure since his debut in public service in 1933, as secretary of agriculture under Franklin D. Roosevelt. His agricultural adjustment act was praised as "far-sighted and heaven sent," and condemned as "a vicious class-ridden measure."

Candidate With Roosevelt

Wallace resigned as secretary of agriculture in 1941, to campaign for the vice-presidency. He had won the nomination to run with Roosevelt over strong opposition in the Democratic convention.

After serving his four-year term as vice-president, a job his father, Henry C. Wallace, had held under Warren Harding, he was appointed secretary of commerce. Opposition to his appointment succeeded in stripping the department of the reconstruction finance commission, which was the main source of opposition.

Wallace served as secretary of commerce from 1945 into 1946, then resigned to become editor of New Republic.

Editorship was not a new task for the Iowan, who had edited the farm journal founded by his grandfather—Wallace's Farmer — from 1924 to 1929.

Wallace is nationally famous not only as a political figure, but as having done outstanding work in the field of agrarian genetics.

Wallace will be the fourth presidential aspirant to speak on the campus in recent weeks. Preceding him have been Norman Thomas, Socialist candidate; and Thomas Dewey and Harold Stassen, Republican hopefuls.

He who is afraid of doing too much is doing too little.
