Ducks Find Own Fort Knox In Fish Pond

SPOKANE, Jan. 26 (AP)—Hundreds of "fishermen" without licenses and out of season have forced the district game supervisor to post a 24-hour patrol at the Griffiths Springs hatchery near Spokane.

The culprits are flocks of hungry ducks swooping down on the rearing ponds at the hatchery to scoop up a mouthful of four-inch rainbow trout.

"The problem is really serious," district supervisor Fred Round said. "We have to do something or there won't be any fish left after the ducks get through."

The ducks have found the rearing ponds with their millions of trout a regular "Fort Knox for ducks" and flap by in the hundreds for a quick snack.

Plans are being considered to place a wire netting over the ponds but until that can be accomplished a guard has been posted to "shoo" the raiders away.

State Board Awards Contracts for Library

Construction on the library addition will probably begin within the next sixty days, said Carl Hintz, head librarian, in an interview yesterday. Bids were awarded to three companies Tuesday at a meeting of the State Board of Higher Education.

The structure will be built on the south side of the library, and will include reader space, book space, and places for individual study. Hintz said there will be space for about 570 additional seats, along with room for approximately 135,000 more volumes. It is not expected to be ready for occupancy until 1950.

Saw Mills Out, Frozen Life Hits Dorms

You think your sleeping porch is cold! You ought to live in the vets' dorm. For the last two weeks saw mills have been shut down. They haven't been producing any hog fuel. The University heating plant uses hog fuel; a situation results.

I. I. Wright at the physical plant is doing his best to lower the freezing rate. As it stands now, the heat in the dorms is turned down at night, not off as it might seem. Fuel, which is oil instead of preferred sawdust or hog fuel, is delivered every day—enough for the next 24 hours.

This condition has been the foundation of many rumors of men being found frozen in their beds under mounds of overcoats, newspapers, dresser scarves and dirty laundry.

New Snow Flurries are Due Today

By Associated Press

A new dose of snow flurries was forecast for Oregon today in the wake of a snowstorm that blanketed most of the state and slowed transportation to a comparative crawl.

Union Pacific trains were running 8 to 10 hours late, after battling wind-driven snow that reduced visibility almost to zero between La Grande and North Powder.

Here in Eugene, the weather bureau predicted continued scattered snow flurries throughout today.

Snow struck all of Oregon but the southern sector yesterday, and added new hazards to already icy roads. A heavy fall occurred in coastal Tillamook.
