Lawyers and Politicians Discuss Pact at Panel

Two lawyers and two political scientists set out on opposite sides of the North Atlantic Security Pact question at Tuesday night's International Relations Club panel discussion . . . and found themselves agreeing more often than not.

Hugh Smith of the law school and Lester Peterson, junior in pre-law, argued for the pact, while Charles P. Schleicher, professor of political science and Walter Dodd, student, opposed it.

The Atlantic Pact is designed to "fill in" some of the United Nations defects, the four agreed, and at best it is a "third or fourth rate necessary evil."

Both sides agreed that—although the pact may be a beginning toward world government—the North Atlantic agreement stops far short of real strength.

Schleicher and Smith both stressed that it merely states that "in event of an armed attack on one of the signing states, the others will do 'what they deem necessary'."

Pact Violates UN Spirit

Schleicher opposed the pact from the view that it violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the U.N. charter. "I may well destroy the possibility of the general success of the U.N." he said.

"The Atlantic Pact," he continued, "is contrary to the most important principle of the charter—that of foregoing force or the use of force."

Pact Faces Facts

Smith contended that the Atlantic Pact was wise in that it recognized facts that couldn't be argued away.

"The psychological effect on the people of western Europe," he continued, "is also important. It shows them that we are still with them, even after the 1953 expiration date of the Marshall Plan.

Doesn't Hinder World Government
"The Atlantic pact, furthermore, does not interfere with world government," he concluded.

Dodd and Peterson, the student speakers, were opposed chiefly on the economic aspects of the pact.

Pact Affects Recovery

Dodd maintained that it hinders recovery and contradicts the Marshall Plan by using its funds for armaments and military aims. Communism, he said, should be fought with its own weapons—which are mainly economic and not military.
