Clark Speech Ends Series

Frederick J. Turner's frontier hypothesis was the topic of a discussion by Dr. Dan E. Clark, head of the history department, Wednesday evening in the last presentation of the Lecture-Forum series for this year. Dr. Clark gave a history of Turner's life and works, his conception of the frontier, and various criticisms of his frontier hypothesis.

America exhibited a return to primitive conditions, a continual rebirth of social aspects in each succeeding frontier. The frontier greatly influenced the composite nationality of the American people, the nationalization of the government, and certain traits of American character, such as the practical, inventive turn of mind, dominant individualism, and restless energy. An opportunity has been afforded by succeeding frontiers to study their evolution and adapt various institutions to suit new conditions.

Turner's basic idea is generally considered to be sound, and the frontier an important influence on American development.
