Don't Get Angry When Fuse Plug Burns Out Because It Is Doing You A Real Service!

Yes, fuse plugs are friendly gadgets. They prevent fire, protect wiring, warn you of overloaded circuits, or indicate the presence of short circuits. Fuses may blow out because:

1. There are too many appliances or lights on a single circuit of wiring.
2. Light or appliance cords may be broken, frayed or wet.
3. Appliances may be overloaded (as may happen if you start your washer while clothes are in the wringer).

If electrical service quits in any part of your home, check fuses first (always make sure you have an extra supply on hand).

If all the lights in the house are out, look out the window to see whether neighbors' lights are also out. If they are not, the trouble is probably in your own house.

Check outlets, cords, etc. (especially the ones you were using when the electricity failed) to see whether any are broken, frayed or wet.

Disconnect the offending cord BEFORE replacing the fuse.

You can sometimes tell whether a fuse is blown by examining the top to see if it is discolored, or an inside wire is burned in two.

Touching only the top of the fuse, unscrew the burned-out one and screw in a new one of the proper size —15-ampere capacity is correct for circuits serving wall outlets, lights and small appliances. NEVER place a penny under the fuse plug; you may set the house on fire if you do!

Some houses have circuit breakers instead of fuses. These automatically "trip" when circuits are overloaded. To re-install service, push the switch which indicates "tripped" as far as possible beyond "off" position, then switch to "on."
