Government Economy Topic of Morse Speech

Government economy can be achieved only after partisan politics are halted, Senator Wayne Morse told Eugene businessmen Friday.

Morse, junior senator from Oregon and former dean of the University School of Law, spoke at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon Friday.

"It is easy to talk economy," he said. "It is not so easy to accomplish, however, when the big economic pressure groups go to work. Too many members of Congress are only too eager for economy in government in any other state but their own."

Morse divided the national budget into what he called "cuts in the economic pie." The largest share, 34 per cent, goes for national defense.

He said this was too much but added he would be quick to vote for every dollar actually needed.

"We need checks on its spending," the senator said. "The best system for economizing on our defense budget is to create an efficient unification policy."

"One of the most nonsensical arguments against unification is that it will lead to a military dictatorship. Under our system of checks and balances, that would be impossible."

Morse recommended no cut in the 13 per cent of the national budget that goes for veterans' benefits except in administrative reductions.
