

Visiting Portland Architects Honored at Dinner Tuesday

Members of the Portland American Institute of Architects, together with the Oregon Society of Landscape Architects, visited the Oregon campus Tuesday.

A dinner honoring these men was held at the Anchorage Cafe, followed by a business meeting at which time guest speakers were introduced.

Pietro Belluschi, Portland architect who designed the Equitable Building, a Fellow in the American Institute of Architects, spoke to the members on "Domestic Architecture."

Belluschi was followed by Glenn Stanton, another Portland architect who is first vice president of the AIA. Stanton's speech concerned the architecture of the state.

day conditions have changed; the bottled goods are sold at the stadium. They call the stuff soda pop.

As the game wore on, the score soared higher and so did the spirits of the spectators; the only spirits registering any appreciable drop being those in the jugs. Today, all this has changed along with the ball game. Instead of a series of line bucks, the game has moved up to a rapid and complicated pace. Now, the spectator must stay reasonably sober to be able to tell the folks all about it when he writes home.

In those days, tearing down goal-posts was a post game custom. Rival student bodies fought out the whole matter.

Well, before we make the old grads too nostalgic, maybe we'd better wend our bleary-eyed way home again in the Stutz. And as the shadows silently sing on another Saturday, watch from the future while Joe squeezes his girl goodnight, kisses the horn bulb, and is off in a shower of bolts.

Frosh: Am I the only man you have ever kissed?

Co-ed: Yes, and by far the best looking.
