PCC Hoops Swish; Utah Sees Ducks

LOS ANGELES—Although they have been overshadowed this fall by football, the basketball teams of the Pacific Coast Conference have been preparing since October 17 for pre-conference openers today.

All of the PCC quintets will open their pre-conference campaigns today or Friday and continue through December. The first league games are scheduled for the weekend of January 3 and 4.

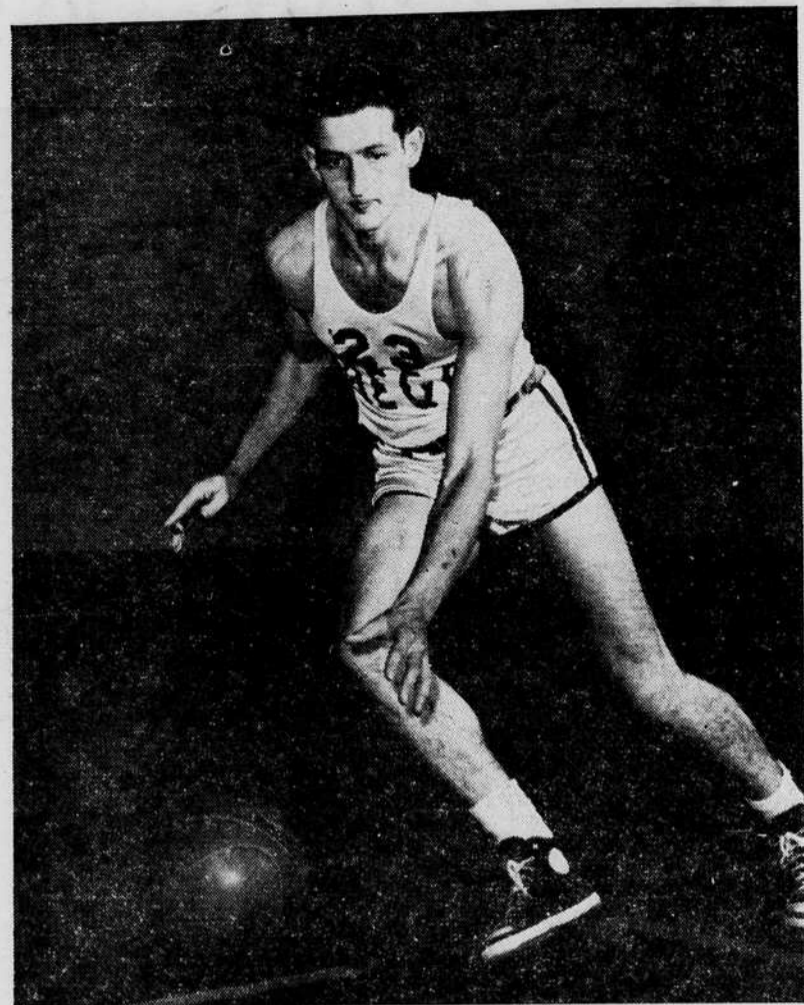

The Oregon State Beavers, defending Pacific Coast Conference champions, open with a five-game road schedule that takes them to New York, but they will return to play one of the most attractive early season home slates. To show off their new 10,200 seat pavillion, the Beavers have signed Minnesota and Indiana from the Big Ten and the perennial favorites from the Rockies, Utah.

In the Southern Division, the defending champs from UCLA have arranged the longest pre-conference road trip. After four warm-up games in Los Angeles, the Bruins start an eight-game road jaunt that carries them through the San Francisco area, to the midwest, and on to Madison Square Garden in New York.

DUCKS PLAY TWO IN SALT LAKE

Oregon and Southern California will be featured in a weekend double header at Salt Lake City to open the season. The Webfoots will meet Utah State and the Trojans take on Utah Friday, and the coast teams switch opponents for the Saturday night fare.

After the Utah double header the Oregons will return home for four games before taking a short hop to major pre-conference games on the midwest. USC plays all of its road.

Stanford will travel only to the north before regular southern division competition begins. The Indians are billed for two games at Eugene against Oregon and one at Seattle against Washington, and play five games in the bay area before opening southern division play.

Duck Golfer Now Double Champ

By JACK FAUST

Strangely enough, it was Ladies' Day that launched one of the greatest careers in this state's golfing history, that of Ron Clark, Oregon amateur and Open Champion, and a student at the University of Oregon.

James Ronald Clark was born in 1928 in The Dalles. He first came in contact with the sport of golfing at the age of five when his mother took him to the local course every Ladies' Day. Ron soon wearied of walking around the course following the players, so he picked up a club and a ball and began to putt, and he was on his way in the world of golf.

Ron played in local tournaments during his years at The Dalles high school, then joined the 82nd Airborne Division after his senior year. In the service he won the Fort Bragg golf crown. As a paratrooper, Ron laughingly asserts that he never jumped once, but was "pushed out" 14 times.

The muscular Mr. Clark entered the University of Oregon in the fall of 1948 and pledged Theta Chi fraternity. In the spring he led his house to the intramural golf title, and stepped outside to play in faster company.

When the amateurs of the state congregated at Astoria in June for the Oregon Golf Association championship meet, Ron Clark was just another name on the huge entry list.

Every new day found that name in the winner's circle, until Ron finally defeated the defending champ, Lou Jennings, 4-3, to take the laurels.

TEAMED WITH STAFFORD

Eyebrows were raised still further when Ron teamed with Lou Stafford, another Oregon great, to win the Mid-Columbia best-ball meet in July. Later in the month, Clark journeyed to Seattle for the Pacific Northwest Golf Association tournament, and proceeded to knock the favorites off right and left.

He finally lost a gruelling 36-hole match, 2-1, to the eventual champion, Bruce McCormick, in the semifinals.

Amid a blustering gale at The Dalles Country Club, Ron won two titles in one tournament. The first was the coveted Oregon Open championship which he pocketed by topping a field led by Emery Zimmerman, Oregon's leading pro.

The second was awarded by the newspapers whose headlines hailed him as the "Golden Boy." In August, he led all amateurs in the Esmerelda Open in Idaho, and when the Hudson Cup matches were held in October, Ron was the Pacific Northwest's leading amateur golfer.

ACTIVE ON CAMPUS

Stocky, brown-eyed Ron is also active in school and fraternal affairs. A sophomore in pre-dentistry, he is a member of Skull and Dagger. At Theta Chi, he was elected pledge class president, and later house secretary. Besides being number one man on the chapter's golf team, Ron played intramural basketball and football.
