Machine Made By Physicists

E. G. Ebbinghausen and Gordon Hoyt of the Physics Department are working on a problem in nuclear physics in Deady Hall.

Thus far the two physicists have been working on an instrument "to measure energies of disintegration products, that is, electrons or Gamma rays, of radio-active nuclei."

According to Dr. Ebbinghausen, Beta rays are high speed electrons emitted by nuclei, while Gamma rays are high energy X-rays. He explains their project as a discovery of information concerning the energy levels in these nuclei.

Sometimes when these nuclei lose some of their surplus energy, they change their structure. The changes keep on occurring till the nuclei becomes stable, that is, can not change.

These scientists get their radioactive samples from the University of California. They plan to get started in earnest as soon as their machine is ready.
