project which was particularly favored by Dean Weigle, to whom research is second nature.

And students outside the J-school can thank the dean for his work on the academic requirement committees; for it was he who suggested the removal of the 45-hour requirement after a Junior Certificate to graduate.

Dean Weigle decided to leave Oregon and return to California during last winter's snow storms. Undoubtedly, had Oregon had one of its milder winters, the Dean would not have been so anxious to return to sunny California.

We wish him luck in warmer climes, where he will be associate director of the journalism institute. There, under the California palms, he will have more time to delve into research.
