British View Sex In New Light, Lecturer States

By YNES POZZI-ESCOT

"The solid opposition to sex education is broken in England," Mr. Cyril Bibby said, opening the University lecture series with a talk on "Sex and Family Life in Britain."

He explained this change has been brought about during the last ten years due to wartime conditions and the concern of the government for venereal diseases. Up to then, sex education had been looked upon suspiciously and had been undertaken only by some progressive individuals and schools.

As a result of the government's interest, a large comprehensive program of sex education was set, lecturers were sent to schools and training courses for teachers were established.

Mr. Bibby pointed out that although England has been slow in accepting sex education, a framework has now been established for considerable work in this field.

"There are no figures," he said, but a fairly large majority of our schools are doing something,"

Youth organizations are also concerned with this matter and a large number of its members are attending courses of sex education. For older groups, marriage guidance centers are operating. Their number has increased in six years from one to a hundred.

In comparing the English and the American approach on sex education, Mr. Bibby noted the difference in terms. Whereas in England the expression "sex education" is used, in America the same content is referred to as "education for family life."

Another difference is that in England the stress has been put on sex education in the schools and in America a considerable program of health education has been developed in upper education.

At the end of the lecture, Mr. 41 for the orientation of new stu- Haar, professor of health educadents include open houses for new- tion, who had introduced the comers and Duckling Counselors, speaker, invited the audience to and publication meetings in living start a brief discussion on the sub-
