Likes Simple Dress-French War Bride's Role Happy One as Housewife, Worker Here

By Larry Kott

When petite Andree Perry discarded her white uniform and hair net and shook out her dark locks to appear in a golden blouse and tailored grey skirt behind the information desk in the lobby of the Student Union last Monday morning, she had been promoted.

Not of great importance was this French war bride's graduation from waitress to saleswoman—it was just another step in the direction of a successful adjustment to her adopted America.

Four years ago the attractive French girl left her native Paris to join her American fiance, Raymond Lee Perry, captain in the U. S. Army. A few days later they were married.

Attain Success

Today, the Perry's drive a '50 Mercury and have successfully managed to divide their time between work, studies, and a two-year-old son. Ray is a senior in political science with a 3.82 GPA. Andree, in addition to her duties at home, works a 48-hour week at the Student Union.

The 26-year-old French girl believes her marriage has worked out far better than those of six other foreign brides she has known. Some have been bitterly disillusioned and have had great difficulty with the language.

"I am the only one I know of to take citizenship," she said.

Andree has a little trouble with English, but it's a great improvement since Paris when she could hardly communicate with her future husband. Her fellow workers believe the merging of American slang with her piquant accent have added to her charm and femininity.

Women Overdress

As for American fashions, poof! Andree believes many American women overdress. She thinks a woman shouldn't wear shining materials unless she has an excellent figure. Andree has no trouble wearing shining materials.

Andree's clothes are generally simple, but individualistic. She has a tendency to shy away from established fashion trends.

And Andree's quick to insist that "French women are no sexier than others. . .It's all up to the man."

Deluge Dampens Five Basements On UO Campus

Wednesday's deluge brought dampened basements to five campus buildings. Johnson Hall was the first to weaken, but I. I. Wright, superintendent of the physical plant, reports that the situation there is pretty well under control.

Three of the newer buildings got soaked around the foundations. Carson Hall's heating tunnel was flooded; with damage to the motors which cannot yet be determined.

The rumpus room got a good share of the water. . .with decorations for tonight's house dance floating around the whole basement. The storage area was checked at 11:30 p.m. Wednesday night, and a pump was operating through Thursday to drain the basement.

Water from sewers backed up into the audio-visual department of the new library section, and into the new area at the University Theater.

Even the museum got saturated. The buildings seem to have Web-foot repellency, as there was not any serious damage reported.

"There's no telling what might happen if we have another rain like that," Wright said. "There's just more water than the sewers can take care of."
