Speech Finally Becoming Respectable, Says McCall

By LaVaun Krueger

"Speech is the means by which man has communicated with man for mutual progress," Roy C. McCall declared in his talk on "Elocution and the New Revolution" at the Alumni Fireside Sunday night in the Student Union.

McCall, head of the speech department, stressed that speech was finally taking on a respectability as a result of its departure from elocution and its advances in the cause and cure of speech disorders.

After giving a brief history of speech, its importance, and the misconceptions about it, McCall launched into an explanation of speech disorders.

Speech delay, a condition in which a child shows no signs of talking even in his fifth or sixth year, was discussed first. By subjecting the child to an intricate pattern of speech stimulation, McCall explained, this condition can often be remedied.

McCall dealt next with aphasia, a disorder in which a person is unable to connect printed, visible, or auditory symbols with words. In these cases, there is nothing wrong with articulation, but a certain part of the brain which enabled the person to translate thoughts or images into words has been destroyed.

Articulation, the opposite of aphasia, was described by McCall as a condition in which a person has nothing wrong with his mind, but is unable to enunciate clearly.

Stuttering, one of the most common speech disorders, was the last topic discussed. The speaker attributed this to an environmental condition which preys on the mind and comes out in the form of stuttering or other physical disturbances. The removal of the disturbing condition, if it can be found, will usually cure the stuttering, McCall said.
