Students Slow In Discussing Sport's Place

By Herb Voreberg

Do you think college athletics are over-emphasized? Remembering recent exposes of fixed games and proselyting of athletes, several students replied:

Merle Davis, sophomore in B.A.—"It isn't the athletics that are overemphasized, but the betting. If legalized gambling would be de-emphasized there would be no reasons to 'fix' games, and this would leave college athletics for the sake of the sport and competition alone."

Delvan Miles, senior in history—"The main fault about athletics is that they are so specialized that the average student cannot compete. Hence the need for greater emphasis on intramurals."

Nancy O'Connor, sophomore in liberal arts—"If they didn't emphasize sports, there wouldn't be any school spirit, and the students wouldn't stick together."

Eugene Chin, senior in B.A.—"Perhaps they are over-emphasized, but it is only natural to play up anything the public is interested in."

Chris Williams, sophomore in pre-med—"I believe that college is a place to study, and I just wish some of the real students could get the kind of scholarships that the athletes do."

Pete Darlington, senior in B.A.—"The major sports are over-emphasized leaving little room for the minor sports which deserve the same recognition."

Jim Sandifer, freshman in B.A.—"These days many athletes come to school only to play sports and not to get an education. It is not only the fault of the athletes, though, as various departments use various methods to induce prize athletes to come to the University only to participate in sports for their Alma Mater."

ed into three groups, in the opinion of the director of the American Institute. There are those who are in favor of an active army of United Nations troops to help them in their struggle; there are those who wish to maintain a condition of neutrality, which Peters thinks is fantastic; and there are those who want Germany to be a kind of buffer state in the present world situation.

The Average Man

The average man in Germany today, said Peters, is in a mood of depression, apathy, and weariness. The officers and soldiers are resentful, he continued, and will not honor with us until we restore their work and stop considering them as war criminals.

It is an incongruous situation, said Peters, where on one hand American officials are asking German officers for advice and on the other prosecuting them for war crimes.

A four-phase method of Communist extension was outlined by Peters. First, he said, comes the occupation of a territory by the Red Army; second, the setting up of a system of government and a strong police force; third, a terrific peace campaign; and finally, a coup d'etat or a violent civil war.

Multnomah, Marion, Lane, and Clackamas are the only Oregon counties which have district courts.
