Inquiring Reporter Students Give Opinions on UO Traffic

By Sue Lichty

University and city officials are pondering over the traffic situation on 13th street, and so students gave their views on what to do about the situation.

Students came up with some unique ideas. Some suggested growing grass where the street now is, building an overpass and charging toll.

The question, "What should be done about the 13th street traffic problem?" brought these answers:

Don Coolidge—junior in architecture—"Close off 13th street. Then fill it in with grass from University street to Kincaid."

Peggy Woods—sophomore in sociology—"Tell people in cars to pay toll while driving down 13th between classes. This would keep most cars from going through."

Don De Forrest—junior in law—"Lay a traffic cop at each end of the street so the cars can't go through."

Betty Lou Russell—senior in education—"I think the street ought to be closed off entirely to all traffic."

Dick Laing—graduate student in sociology—"Put overpasses on 13th street. It certainly won't alleviate the problem by having the traffic cop give tickets."

Jean Ellickson—freshman in liberal arts—"It seems like they ought to have a different place for the traffic, but there isn't any other place."

Arthur Webb—sophomore in liberal arts—"Give the campus cop more power or have the city police make people obey the stop signs."

Kathy Rabbitt—sophomore in liberal arts—"People are liable to be run down. It's dangerous, and can only be helped if the campus policeman gives drivers tickets."
