Webfoots Want More Control By Students

By Sue Lichty

"Do you feel there is a need for more student government at the university?"

To this question, most students interviewed said "Yes." Many felt that the real governing of students is by the administration and not student body officers.

However, the suggestion was given that students should gain a more thorough knowledge of student government in order to do a better job of it.

A few thought that there is little need for more student government. Reasons given were that students lack time and experience and few take an active interest in school affairs.

Burr Boutwell—junior in architecture—"We don't have enough. Since many of us are 21 or over, the students ought to govern themselves and let the administration act merely in an advisory capacity."

Sue Finzer—senior in English—"Yes! Definitely! The students should gain a more thorough knowledge of student government, so they can assert themselves more powerfully."

Ethel Larson—sophomore in pre-education—"I really don't think until students take a more active interest that there is any need for more student government."

Marcia Hodgson—freshman in education—"There is a need for more if they don't abuse the right to have the government in their own hands."

Ed Graboski—junior in geology—"Students don't have fair say about what goes on. The administration has the real say so. There should be more student government without a doubt."

Dolores Brice—sophomore in mathematics—"No. Students don't have the time and experience to run the school, and the administration would tell them what to do anyway."

Keith Krechel—freshman in business administration—"I think the students are running the government now. Of course we need the opinions of the administration, but the students should make the decisions."
