

Duck Tracks

By Bill Gurney
Emerald Sports Editor

In fairness to Bob Peterson, it should be noted that he did attend basketball practice each night last week, and the fact that he was absent from the lineup during the St. Mary's series was due to differences between him and Borchers. In this column Tuesday, Don Dewey wrote that Pete had missed practice altogether, and that his absence was the reason for his stay on the bench.

Will Peterson be back in the lineup for the important Washington series? The answer depends on whether or not he realizes that there can be only one coach on any team.

At any rate, the vaunted Huskies are coming to town, and every man on the Duck team will have to play inspired basketball if they hope to gain so much as a split with the men from Seattle. One thing is certain; they certainly can't play any worse basketball against Washington this weekend than they exhibited in the first pair of tilts at Edmundson Pavillion. Chuck Finley, Idaho coach, says in L. H. Gregory's "Greg's Gossip" in the Oregonian, that Oregon should split the series, if this is any comfort.

Farnum and Covey Improving

Showing improvement in the St. Mary's series were Keith Farnum and Bud Covey, who hadn't been able to exhibit much earlier in the season. Farnum, a six-foot, two-inch forward from Salem, was demoted to the junior varsity squad just before the series, but showed so well against the OSC jayvees that he also saw considerable action in both varsity tilts. The junior from Salem made nine points Friday, and four as a starter Saturday night, when he sank 17 points to lead the St. Mary's looks as though he may continue to add badly needed scoring punch to the Duck team.

Covey, also a junior, is an ex-Jefferson high school star from Portland, who was held out of varsity competition last season. He is a husky boy with considerable speed, and played especially well Friday night.

On one instance in the closing seconds of the game, he made a beautiful steal down near the Gael basket and collected a lay-in. He has not scored extensively as yet, with seven points Friday evening his tops for the season, but has a two handed set shot which looks as if it might be deadly if he were "on."

Brooklyn Boy is Set Shot Artist

Speaking of two-handed set shots, the one exhibited by slim Art Pidoriani of the Gaels was almost uncanny. Especially Saturday night, when he sank 17 points to lead the St. Mary's squad. Pidoriani is from Brooklyn, and his style of play showed it. In eastern basketball circles, the two-handed set shot is the standard article in a player's bag of tricks. Offenses are devised especially to give such deadeyes that split second they need to sight on the hoop and cast off.

In fact the whole deliberate ball-control exhibition given by the Gaels Saturday night was typical of traditional eastern basketball. Of course, Slats Gill of Oregon State has long been an exponent of deliberate basketball, and Chuck Finley's Idaho Vandals also like to take things slow and easy. The WSC Cougars aren't a lighting fast break outfit, either. That seems to indicate that Oregon and Washington are the only ND teams this season who really run in a big way.

Guisness Likes to Play Oregon at Seattle

Which brings us back to the impending Washington series. We have a press release from the U of W which states that Frank Guisness, stylish Husky forward, would like to play against the University of Oregon every day and twice on Sunday, especially on the Edmundson Pavillion floor.

In his three varsity seasons Guisness has scored 96 points in six home games with Oregon. The first time he competed against them as a sophomore in 1950, he accounted for 27 of these counters, most of them on driving plays from his guard position. He added 12 the next night for a series total of 39.

Let's Hope Jinx Isn't Transferable

In his last four home contests, including the pair of debacles he helped perpetrate against the Ducks on Jan. 18 and 19, Guisness has collected 63 more points to round out his 96 total and a 16 points-per-game average.

He was good for 19 and 17 points in the recent Seattle series, with Mel Streeter guarding him. Perhaps he has some sort of jinx on the Ducks at Seattle. Let's hope it does not carry over to Eugene. A lot will depend on who Borchers assigns to guard him, and how well that man performs.

Bonneman Was Versatile Athlete in South Dakota

By Martin Meadows

Hank Bonneman, a junior on Coach Bill Borchers' basketball squad who stretches six-feet, seven inches into the atmosphere, is a refugee from the flatlands of South Dakota, where he attended high school in the town of Huron.

Berg Told Hank

The altitudinous PE major was first told about Oregon by Reedy Berg, a former Oregon varsity player who graduated in 1948. Berg, who also hails from Huron, finally talked Hank into making the long trek west.

At Huron High school Hank was on the varsity hoop team for three years, capping things off by making the All-State team during his senior year, when he scored 32.5 points in 24 games, which is a neat 15.6 points-per-game average.

In football Bonneman also put in three years, two of them as a tackle and one year at an end position. Hank also captured the state discus title in track his senior year by spinning the platter a distance of 133 feet.

All This and Baseball Too

Further demonstrating his versatility, Hank participated in Junior Legion baseball in his home state.

SAE's Crush Tekes

times while the Fijis had 14 fouls called on them for a total of 32 fouls in the game.

Sigma Alpha Epsilon had a picnic with the Tekes, as they thoroughly trounced them 35 to 9. At no time during the game did the Tekes cause the SAE men any worry. The halftime score was 20 to 7 and matters went from bad to worse for the Tekes as they were able to add only two points in the second half while SAE kept up their merry pace with 15 points in the second period.

The scoring honors for the game went to Bob Carlson of SAE with 11 points. He was followed by Pat Dignan with nine and Mike Kirtledge with six. This was the cleanest game of the afternoon in the matter of fouls with SAE being called three times and TKE four times.

Delta Upsilon took their handball match from Sigma Phi Epsilon two games to one.
