World News Capsules -Strikes, Labor Disputes Give U.S. Headache, Slow Up Defense Drive

Compiled by Donna Lindbeck (From the wires of the United Press and Associated Press)

Strikes and strike threats involving roughly 1 million workers Sunday gave the nation one of its biggest labor headaches since the record outbreak of 1946.

Officials made no secret of the fact that the situation represents a grave threat to the defense drive.

The government is keeping an eye on labor disputes in such vital industries as steel, oil, communications, and railroads.

In addition, it expects to hear any day from John L. Lewis and his 475,000 United Mine workers. All told, national labor relations are probably more turbulent than at any time since October, 1949, when the coal miners were on a three-day week and some 1 million steelworkers were on strike.

Federal Communications mediators met . . .

... union and company representatives in New York Sunday night in a non-stop effort to avert a 43-state telephone strike scheduled for 6 a.m. (local time) Monday.

Officials of the CIO Communications Workers of America and the Western Electric company met separately while federal mediators shuttled back and forth trying to seek solutions to disputes involving wages, a union shop and other key issues.

... intensified their efforts Sunday night in New York to forestall a crippling nationwide steel strike Wednesday, and Wage Stabilization Board Chairman Nathan P. Feinsinger said "gradual progress" has been made.

Feinsinger met throughout the day and evening with the officials of the CIO United Steelworkers union and the "Big Six" steel companies. He brought them together for their first talks since Thursday, and pleaded with them to avert a strike that would idle 650,000 workers, halt 95 per cent of the nation's steel production, and cut deeply nto the defense effort. A strike is scheduled for 12:01 a.m. Wednesday at about 200 plants.
