

Our Political Dilemma

If past action is any indication of what the future holds, we should have, at least, a three ring political circus this spring.

We've already seen two rather large developments in that area:

1. a four-house bolt from now-defunct USA to AGS;
2. the death of USA as a name and the emergence of a new political party, United Independent Students, which is USA minus the four.

One of the most significant things about this newly named organization is its acceptance of an exclusion clause which says there'll be no welcome mat out (as formerly) for the unhappy greek house with a candidate but no track to run him on.

The reason for it, apparently, is that UIS creators felt this would bolster the faith of no-party independents in an organization which, by rule, would be entirely independent. No more greeks bouncing in one year and out the next to make it look (as USA occasionally did) like Grand Central station at high noon.

Well, one side has just as much right to throw up barriers as the other—and AGS already has a two-year penalty period in which returning houses can't put up candidates for AGS or ASUO office through that party. It seems to us, however, that there is nothing very good about these exclusion clauses, no matter who has them.

As it stands now, there's nothing between the two extremes in our political spectrum. You're either a greek or an independent politically. So we're right back where we started from. And as far as we're concerned, without a coalition party of greeks and independents, campus politics has lost much of whatever meaning it did have.

We're supposed to be learning how to live together and get along. But this situation can't help but increase the stupid, bitter friction which exists between greeks and independents, especially during our political spring term. It shouldn't be.

We go to class together, cheer at games together, go out together and by these and other means learn that there is no difference between one who lives in a house and one who lives in a dorm. None. Absolutely none.

Yet we can't vote together or work out what political problems do exist—we don't have a party any more. Granted USA wasn't much of a greek-independent coalition, but it was a start.

There's nothing left in the middle any more. It's a miserable situation and no credit to us.

We Got the Word

The Oregon Daily Emerald, just like any college student, took an examination not so long ago. We're not too proud of the results.

The Emerald, in competition with 422 other college and junior college newspapers for all-American rating, came out with a third class or "fair" rating.

Our scorer tossed a few bouquets—good sports page, aggressive coverage of last fall's political campaign, good features—but when the points were added up, the result was painfully obvious. We've got work to do.

It's fun to compete with other papers for top honors, and we've had more than our share of them. But this time we've come away with what amounts to a good talking-to.

He'll Probably Be Speechless Anyway

"After all the trouble I had in this house getting you a blind date, Worthal, I don't want to hear any remarks."
