

Will We Say 'Yes'?

A pundit once suggested that insurance salesmen could be added to that two-word list—death and taxes. He may have been right.

Insurance has come to the campus. It looks though, as if it might be a pretty good thing.

For $1.50 a term, Oregon students get blanket coverage. This includes accidents on skiing trips, field trips, in laboratories. Hospitalization, dental and surgery costs will be covered when they result from an accident.

It even extends into summer vacation, if you pay for three terms at once. If this is similar to buying the big, economy size, it proves the selling power of a bargain, even in insurance.

Women's athletics, formerly uncovered, fall under the proposed plan. This is more of an advantage than is apparent, since women's sports can get rough. Ever see one of those field hockey tournaments? A broken collarbone is a minor mishap.

We can't help musing at the policy terms. Five hundred dollars blanket coverage, and $500 if the holder dies. If he loses both arms, he gets $1000, but only $500 for one arm. There are similar terms for loss of eyes and legs. Since the human body is worth only about 69 cents, this is really a buy.

The practicality and simplicity of the proposed plan can't be over-emphasized, however. It doesn't interfere with existing campus insurance programs, those for inter-scholastic sports and the student health service.

It's cheap, too. And it comes from a reputable company, although the ASUO Senate is wisely asking for bids from other organizations.

All a policy holder will have to do to file a claim is telephone the company office. A doctor's statement is the only certification required.

Each student will be an individual policy holder, with his own policy number.

There's just one hitch. The plan must be ratified by the student body at the spring term elections.

Judging from past election returns, it is doubtful whether the students will vote with consideration on any serious measure.

It's even doubtful whether enough of them will vote to pass the program.
